Homecoming kicks off this week

Body building removed from event list

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Purple pride will be abundant this week as Homecoming kicks off.

Filled with a variety of events that lets K-State supporters cheer on the university, Homecoming week allows living organizations to participate in competitions and create an atmosphere of spirit and fun.

Brian Briggeman, senior in business and external vice president for Interfraternity Council, said Homecoming is a great time of year.

"Every chapter really looks forward to Homecoming," Briggemann said.

This week, social chairs from all over campus are taking time to organize events and make sure the week goes smoothly.

"The social chairs are the busiest people on campus this week," said Jeff Elliott, junior in accounting and social chairman for Kappa Sigma fraternity.

Events start today with the placement of spirit banners in the K-State Student Union. Bernie Haney, chairman of 1999 All-University Homecoming committee, said the banner event is a good way to kick off the week.

"I would encourage everybody to go by and check out the banners," Haney said. "On Thursday we will take them over to Bramlage for Fright Night."

Also today, the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls is sponsoring its Homecoming will be in full-swing this week with a variety of events. But one thing is missing this year — the bodybuilding event.

Organizers said they decided to discontinue the bodybuilding competition after last year because of injuries and also because the event's schedule conflicted with academic success.

"There were some things that concerned the faculty and university as a whole," said Bernie Haney, chairman of the All-University Homecoming Committee. "Some people involved with it began preparing two months beforehand for a one-day event."

Haney said despite the concerns, it was hard to make a decision to discontinue the event.

"It was a tough decision to make because they formed a team atmosphere with stunts and the pyramid formations," Haney said.

Brian Briggeman, senior in business and external vice president for the Interfraternity Council, said the event became a campus tradition.

"It was hard to see it go because it had been a part of Homecoming week for so long," he said.

Dole to give lecture today at McCain

■ Former senator to deliver speech about government effects on media.

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

The effect of government on small-town news media will be the topic of Bob Dole's Huck Boyd lecture today.

Dole, a former U. S. senator and Republican presidential nominee, will speak at 1:30 p.m. today in McCain Auditorium. The event is free and open to the public.

DOLE

Gloria Freeland, director of the Huck Boyd Center for Community Media, said Dole wanted to give the lecture, "Grass Roots Journalism, Grass Roots Democracy," because he considers Boyd to be one of the biggest influences in his career.

"Dole considered Huck Boyd to be one of his political mentors," Freeland said. "He believes in the same concepts as Huck Boyd, so that is why we thought that he would be a good person to deliver the first Huck Boyd lecture.

"I think that he is planning to speak on the local level of politics and tie in how media influences that level of government."

Freeland said there has been positive feedback thus far to the idea of Dole coming to give the lecture.

"The response from people so far has been that they are interested," Freeland said. "Hopefully, the enthusiasm will mean more lectures in the future."

Sam Bradley, graduate student in mass communications, said he has been doing public-relations work for the center in preparation for the lecture.

"With a school that is so rich in community tradition as K-State, I think that the students will be interested in what Sen. Dole has to say," Bradley said.

Jane Goodall, world-renowned primatologist and leading authority on chimpanzee behavior, spoke to area children Friday as part of the Roots and Shoots program. Goodall's interest in animal behavior started when she was 4, when she wondered how hens laid eggs — "Where is the hole big enough for the eggs to come out?" When no one answered her, she stayed four hours in a hen house to find out.

humility & VISION

STORIES BY TANNER EHMKE

World-renowned primatologist Goodall visits K-State, speaks at McCain Auditorium

Hundreds stood in line. Some laughed with excitement. Others dried the tears from their cheek while they wept with joy, holding tight the book filled with a message of hope for the future. They all waited to meet the inspirational author.

Jane Goodall, world-renowned primatologist and leading authority on chimpanzee behavior, spoke Saturday at McCain Auditorium to a crowd of more than 1,500. The audience crowded the halls after the lecture waiting for her to autograph her latest book, "Reason for Hope: A Spiritual Journey," the focus of her lecture tour.

Goodall's journey began at the age of 23 when she left England on a boat to Africa in 1957 to visit a friend. By fate, she met the famed anthropologist Dr. Louis Leakey, who offered her the opportunity to work with him and to study chimpanzees in the Gombe forest. She was young and untrained.

And she was a woman.

Despite the objections of authorities and contributors, Goodall began the pioneering research of the complex social structures of chimpanzees.

Her observations of chimpanzees challenged human uniqueness. She witnessed chimpanzees using twigs stripped of their leaves to dig for termites, proving that humans were not the only toolmakers. She also observed long-term supportive bonds between family members in the chimpanzee community.

"We've learned humility," Goodall said, commenting on what we've learned not as scientists, but as human beings. "We're not as different. We've realized our relationship with the rest of the animal kingdom."

Not only has Goodall realized the connection between humans and apes, but she also has recognized the source of her success — the people who helped her through the years. She illustrated her success through a story of an eagle trying to fly higher than any animal. Riding on the back of the eagle was a wren hiding in its feathers.

"How high can we fly by ourselves? We all need our eagle. All of the feathers are important," she said.

Goodall said many modern problems, from the disappearance of chimpanzees to pollution and war, stem from a problem she calls "just-me-ism," the apathy and unwillingness to be part of the solution. Too many people think what they do will not make a difference, she said.

There are now only 120 chimpanzees in the wild. The gene pool is not big enough for them to survive, Goodall said. Increased human population, poverty, refugees and hunting of the animals have resulted in near extinction.

"We are betraying our own humanity when we betray our closest living relatives," she said.

Her efforts in Gombe have helped improve the lives of the local people, also making a brighter future for the wild chimpanzees. Decreasing poverty helps the people become less reliant on exploiting the land.

"We cannot blame the people in poverty," she said. "They're too poor to be concerned about the future 10 years down the road."

There are four reasons for us to have hope, she said. First, the human brain can be used to solve problems and can be used to live in harmony. The resilience of nature proves that life will find a way. The power and energy of young people creates progress. Finally, the indomitable human spirit teaches us that one person can make a difference.

Goodall teaches children at Sunset Zoo

More than 850 children learned how to say hello in a language unknown to most humans when Jane Goodall hooted into the microphone, imitating the greetings of wild chimpanzees as part of the Roots and Shoots program Friday morning at Sunset Zoological Park.

The program, created by Goodall, teaches children about the environment, their community and animals. The children came from 11 different schools to attend six of 30 workshops throughout the day, from animal observation to understanding different cultures.

"This is not just another environmental group," Goodall said. "We want to teach children that they do matter and that they can make a dif-

Support overwhelms parents of Wichita girl killed in 1990

WICHITA — The parents of a 9-year-old Wichita girl who was kidnapped and killed in 1990 have been overwhelmed by public support in their campaign to keep one of the men involved in the crime in prison.

Three weeks ago, Bo and Julie Shoemaker started circulating a petition opposing parole for Donald Wacker, convicted of kidnapping their daughter, Nancy, and aiding her killer.

The Shoemakers were expecting to get about 5,000 signatures.

At last count, about 30,000 signatures have been gathered through an informal network of businesses, strangers and friends.

The names have come from Belle Plaine, Norwich, Valley Center, Derby, Hutchinson — all over south-central Kansas.

A couple in their 70s drove from Sumner County to Wichita to sign the petition. A tire deliveryman spread the petition to all the businesses on his route; only one of the 75 shops declined to post it. One day, a police patrol car pulled up to the Wichita auto repair shop where Bo Shoemaker works — bearing signatures.

"If you had Bill Gates' money, you still couldn't buy this much support and care," Shoemaker said.

Kansas Parole Board officials said they have not heard of so many signatures against a possible parole. Yet the petition is only one of several things the board must consider, they said.

Bids in online sale to begin at $15,000 for models' eggs

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — A fashion photographer, hoping to cash in on would-be parents' wishes for a beautiful baby, is offering the eggs of eight models in an online auction set to start today.

Infertility groups have expressed disgust at the offer, saying it turns human life into a commodity. But photographer Ron Harris says his offer is a reflection of American society, where beauty can be purchased by the highest bidder.

The Web site, www.ronsangels.com, has pictures of eight models offering their eggs for sale. The bids start at $15,000 and can go as high as $150,000. Harris said the Web site already had received a serious bid of $42,000.

The models receive the full amount offered; bidders must pay Harris' organization an additional 20 percent service fee, he said.

"It's unethical, and it's distasteful," Sean Tipton, spokesman for the American Society of Reproductive Medicine, said Saturday.

Infertility specialists increasingly are concerned about putting a price tag on human eggs. This spring, for example, a couple advertised that they would pay $50,000 for eggs donated from an athletic student from a top college.

Federal law forbids the purchase and sale of human organs, but trafficking in sperm and eggs is legal, infertility experts say.

Harris is a Malibu, Calif., photographer whose work includes fashion photos, television directing for Playboy and exercise videos. He said he uses professional judgment to decide which potential donors are beautiful.

"That's what I did all my life," he said. "That's my expertise."

His Web site boasts that the models are "beautiful and healthy" and subject to rigorous health examinations. In a letter on the site, Harris describes the egg auction as "Darwin's Natural Selection at its very best."

He says society's obsession with appearance has made us stronger and healthier, and he pitches the egg auction as a chance for parents to give their children an advantage in society.

"Every organism is evolving to its most perfect state," Harris writes. "Finding traits that 'repair' your genetic flaws is what we are all about."

The models could not be reached for comment Saturday, but on the Web site, each gives reasons for selling her eggs, ranging from "to not be dependent on a man," to "I want to help others."

Teen-ager sang to friends about shooting, police say

METAIRIE, La. — A 17-year-old boy collected $25 for shooting and wounding a golfer, then told his friends about it in a rap song, police say.

In a parody of a song made popular by Bob Marley and Eric Clapton, Patrick R. Cheron sang: "I shot the golfer, but not the man next to him," police say.

Cheron was arrested Friday on an attempted-murder charge. Also arrested were Matthew D. Scalco, 17, who allegedly drove the getaway car, and Mark D. Levy, 17, whom police say offered the $25 dare.

Cheron used his father's .22-caliber handgun to shoot the 54-year-old golfer as he prepared to hit a shot on the second hole at Metairie Country Club, authorities said. The bullet left a quarter-sized hole in the man's pelvis and remains lodged in his body.

Rodeo Club sponsors weekend competition for fun in Weber Arena

By Jamie Barrett
Kansas State Collegian

Karen Mikols/Collegian
John Wiel ropes a calf in the K-State Alumni Rodeo on Saturday afternoon in Weber Arena. His 12.10-second time earned him the first place prize of $84. The rodeo was hosted by the Rodeo Club.

Area alumni and rodeo fans headed to Weber Arena on Saturday and Sunday for the Alumni Rodeo, sponsored by the K-State Rodeo Club.

The Rodeo Club is host to the rodeo every year and invites alumni to come participate and watch. The rodeo is one of the many events the Rodeo Club sponsors and participates in.

Steve Frazier, K-State Rodeo Club coach, said the actual rodeo was on Saturday, and Sunday the club had a jackpot competition.

Frazier said the jackpot competition was different from the rodeo because it was intended to show-off roping skills.

"Saturday was when the actual rodeo was held," Frazier said, "and on Sunday we just roped and had fun."

Frazier said the participants competed just for the sake of rodeo.

"In this rodeo, we did not have prizes or anything," Frazier said. "We just wanted to let people get together and rodeo for fun."

Frazier said the rodeo occurs yearly, and there are many people who come back each year to participate.

Brock Baker, junior in agricultural education and president of the Rodeo Club, said he has participated in the Alumni Rodeo for many years.

"The audience turnout and the participation in the rodeo has always been good," Baker said.

"I competed myself and have for years, so I know what to expect from this rodeo."

The Alumni Rodeo is only one of the many events in which the Rodeo Club participates.

Frazier said the Rodeo Club has jackpot teams that compete, and the club also competes in the Intercollegiate Rodeo during the last week in February.

"The Intercollegiate Rodeo is rated to be one of the best in Kansas," Frazier said. "The Rodeo Club really enjoys attending that and being a part of such a good rodeo."

Baker said the Alumni Rodeo went as well as it has in the past.

"I am usually happy with the way that things go in this rodeo," he said.

Melissa Haddad, sophomore in open-option, said she attended the rodeo because she loves being around horses and always has enjoyed rodeo and its level of competition.

"I have worked with horses for a long time, and I love to do anything that has to do with horses," Haddad said. "I heard about this rodeo and thought that it sounded like a good time."

Frazier said the rodeo always has been a good experience for the Rodeo Club and for the people who compete.

"For as long as I have been the coach of the Rodeo Club, the Alumni Rodeo has been working out very well," Frazier said.

Polls predict opposition leader winner of Argentinian election

By Bill Cormier
The Associated Press

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — Fernando De la Rua, the opposition leader who cast himself as the best bet for a populace weary of recession and the flamboyant decade-long rule of Carlos Menem, appeared headed for a landslide victory in Sunday's presidential vote, exit polls showed.

"If I had been permitted to run, I am sure I would have won. But I still have time for a future presidential election."

— Carlos Menem, Argentine Leader

De la Rua, the 62-year-old mayor of Buenos Aires, scored just more than 51 percent of the ballot to 35 percent for Eduardo Duhalde, 58, the candidate of Menem's Peronist Party and governor of Buenos Aires province, according to the exit poll broadcast by Radio Continential. The result was released moments after the balloting ended at 6 p.m. local time.

Should the official results uphold the figures, De la Rua would become president on Dec. 10.

Horn honking erupted in Buenos Aires as De la Rua supporters toasted the results of the exit poll, one of two showing a similar big victory for the Buenos Aires mayor. De la Rua himself had expressed confidence throughout the day.

"We did our campaign job," he said while casting his vote Sunday.

Menem, who voted in his native La Rioja Province, had scoffed at campaign polls suggesting his ruling Peronist party was headed for a resounding defeat in the presidential ballot.

"If I had been permitted to run, I am sure I would have won. But I still have time for a future presidential election," Menem said before flying back to the capital Sunday.

Menem had flirted with seeking an unprecedented third straight term but was barred by a constitutional prohibition and has said he will run again in 2003.

First preliminary returns were not expected for hours, but exit polls have held up traditionally in past elections.

Earlier, Duhalde voted after attending Mass near his home in the southern Buenos Aires suburb of Lomas de Zamora, telling reporters afterward it was up to the voters to speak.

"What I would like to say is that we should feel proud that, for the fourth consecutive time, we are electing a president in the democratic manner," he said, noting Argentina's past military interventions, including the last dictatorship from 1976 to 1983.

To triumph in one round of voting, a candidate needed 45 percent of the ballot outright on Sunday — or must have garnered between 40 percent and 45 percent of the ballot with a 10-percent lead over the runner-up. A runoff would be held Nov. 14.

Menem, 69, while constitutionally barred from seeking a third consecutive term, said over the weekend that he would run again in 2003. Elected to a six-year term in 1989, he was re-elected in 1995 for another four years after the constitution was amended to allow re-election and to reduce the term.

Ten years ago, Menem inherited an economy in shambles. He helped revive it by pushing for reforms, privatizing public industries such as electricity and transportation and removing barriers to foreign investment.

As he prepares to step down on Dec. 10, though, the economy is again in recession. Unemployment is nearing 14 percent, corruption is rampant and crime is rising.

De la Rua is backed by the center-left Opposition Alliance made up of his own Radical Party and the Front for a Country in Solidarity. Peronist candidate Duhalde, 53, wields considerable clout as governor of the province surrounding the capital, home to a third of the country's 36 million people.

Both of them pledged to fight the recession and battle unemployment.

Casting himself as the sure but sedate alternative to Menem, De la Rua has said he would encourage small business development and debt refinancing to bolster economic growth. Duhalde has said he would seek an agreement with businesses for a voluntary freeze on firings for one year.

Other candidates, including former Economic Minister Domingo Cavallo, lagged in the polls. Some 24 million Argentines were eligible and legally required to vote in Sunday's election.

Voters also were choosing new governors in six of Argentina's 23 provinces, including the largest, Buenos Aires. They were filling 116 of the 257 seats in the lower House of Congress. No Senate seats were up for election.

Judge sentences Maryland teen-ager to 24 years for murder

By Dina Kraft
Associated Press Writer

TEL AVIV, Israel — Calling the murder and dismemberment of a Maryland teenager an act of desecration, an Israeli judge on Sunday ended a lengthy and painful episode in Israel-U.S. relations by sentencing Samuel Sheinbein to 24 years in prison.

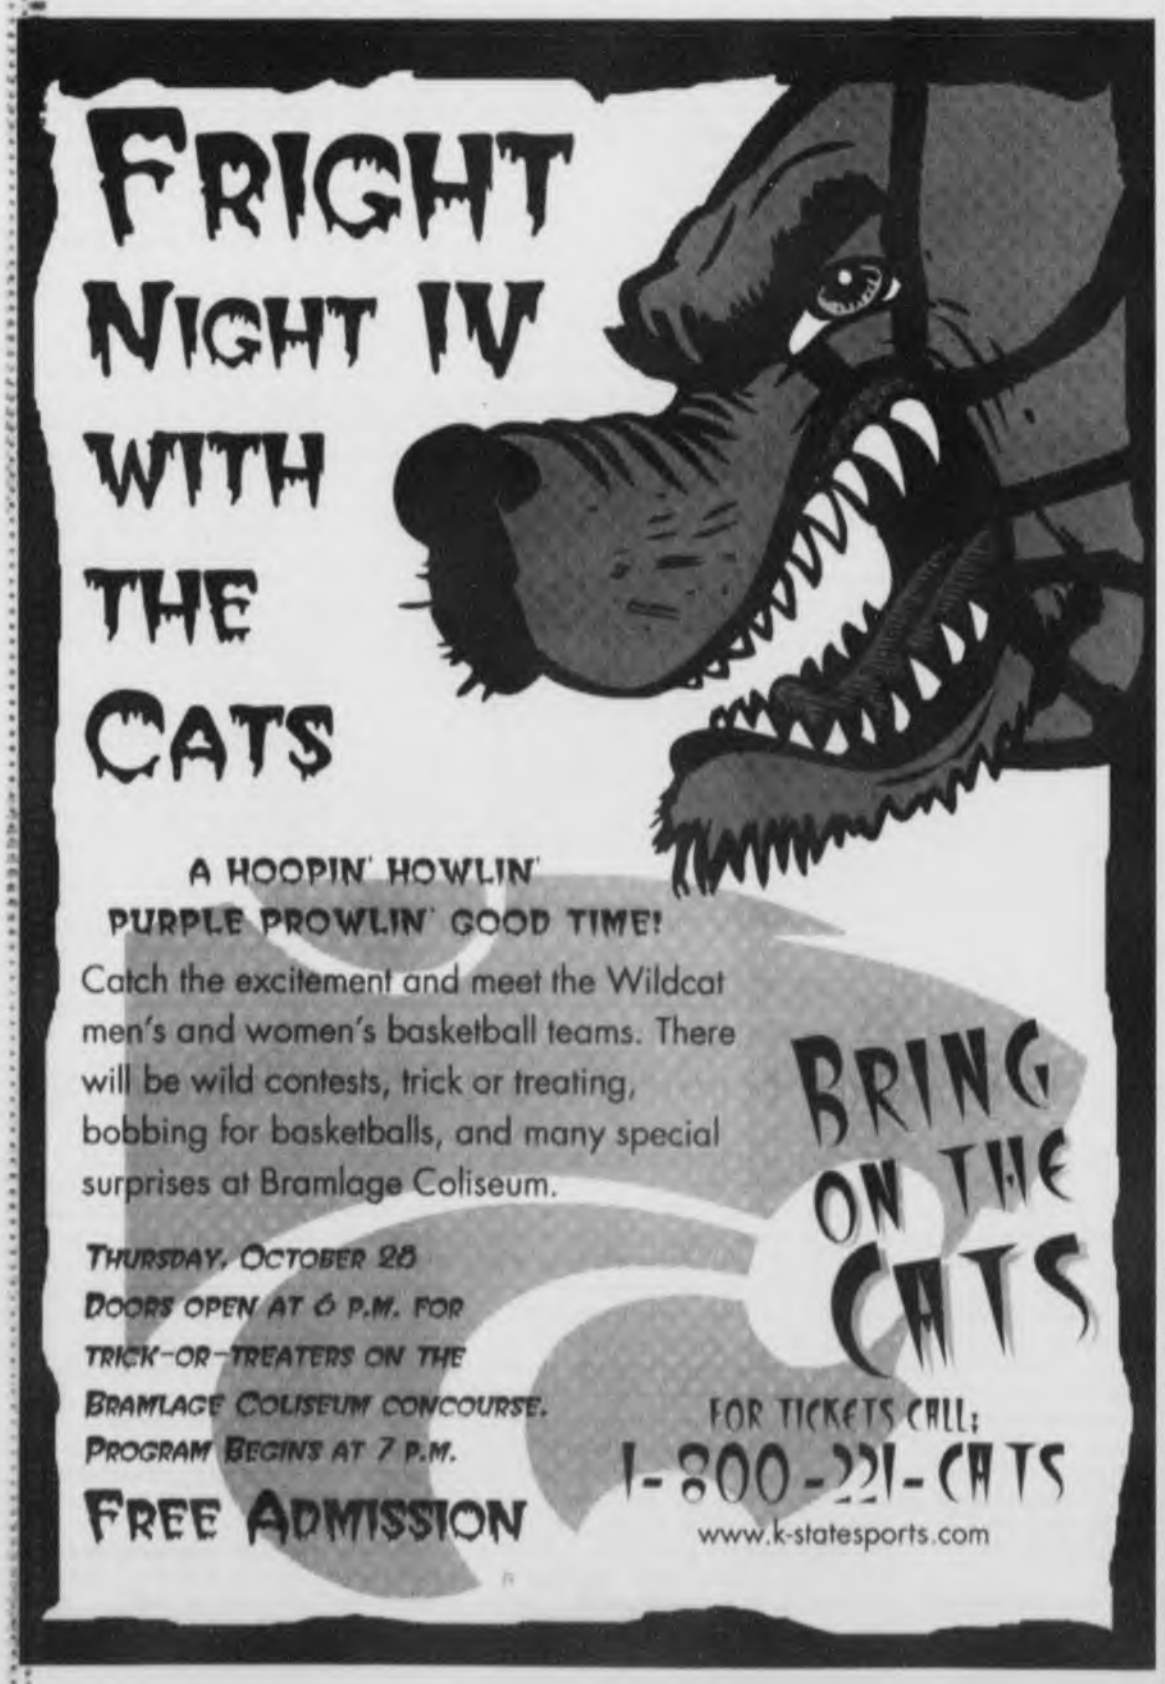
Sheinbein, 19, hands behind his back, did not respond as the verdict was read two years after he fled to Israel and sought refuge from extradition, enraging Maryland authorities and briefly threatening U.S. aid to the Jewish state.

Judge Uri Goren's sentence was not a surprise; lawyers for Sheinbein and the Israeli prosecution had arrived at the plea bargain in August.

Sheinbein would be eligible for parole after two-thirds of his sentence is served. He also might be eligible for 24-hour furloughs in as soon as four years. The sentence was backdated to Sheinbein's arraignment in 1997.

Under Maryland law, Sheinbein could have drawn a life sentence without parole. Until now, Israeli minors convicted of murder have never received more than a 20-year sentence.

Sheinbein confessed in September to choking 19-year-old Alfred Tello Jr. with a rope and hitting him several times with a sharp object — actions that caused his death. Sheinbein, who was 17 at the time, then dismembered the body with an electric saw and burned it.



Aaron Needle, a friend Maryland authorities also believe was involved in the murder, killed himself while in detention in Maryland.

Such "shocking acts of desecration to the deceased's body, acts that are too horrendous to describe ... show us to what depths the defendant sank and how inhuman he became at the time," Goren wrote in his sentencing.

Sheinbein fled to Israel within days of the discovery of Tello's remains in an empty garage near Sheinbein's home in Aspen Hill, Md.

Sheinbein successfully sought refuge under a law that prevented the extradition of Israeli citizens to foreign courts. Sheinbein had only passing contact with Israel, but his father, Saul, was born in the country.

A court recognized Sheinbein's right to be tried here, and Israel's attorney general appealed the decision all the way to the Supreme Court. When that failed, earlier this year, the state started proceedings against him.

'Oz' planners dreaming; they're only in Kansas

Kansans would be better off if the executives running Oz Entertainment would put on their ruby red slippers and tap their heels home to California.

The company wants to build a Wonderful World of Oz theme park on the abandoned Sunflower Army Ammunition Plant in DeSoto, Kan. It doesn't take much more than straw for brains to realize the theme park will not work.

On the abandoned field, the group is trying to build their cash cow similar to Walt Disney's theme parks. One reason the Disney parks are so popular is location. Built in sunny Florida and California, the locations offers pristine weather to attract tourists. Their location allows Disney parks to remain open year-round. Kansas just doesn't boast the same climate. In a best-case scenario, the Oz park could be open for business nine months of the year. Several of those months would probably be filled with rainy days and frigid winds.

Disney parks also are near other tourist attractions like Hollywood and beaches. The nearest attraction to the Oz theme park will be Kansas City, with its rapidly-decreasing numbers of hotel rooms and attractions. That doesn't seem to spell success.

Disney parks also boast the advantage of a never-ending number of characters and movies for merchandise and rides. They have the option of changing over time, because when people grow tired of some characters or hype, Disney can replace them with new ones. The Wizard of Oz is one movie, released decades ago, with a limited cast.

However, Kansans should take heart, because the entertainment company has been working on this project unsuccessfully for almost 10 years. There are reasons progress has been so slow. One of those reasons is that K-State wants some of that land to build a research station.

K-Staters aren't the only ones unhappy about the possibility of a theme park. Kansas citizens don't seem too thrilled about the project, either. In fact, the only people who appear to be excited about it are the Wonderful World of Oz execs and Kansas' Ben Vidrickson, the state chairman of transportation and tourism.

Hopefully, when all is said and done, we'll wake up and realize the Wonderful World of Oz theme park project was just a bad dream.

I just want to tell all those whiners that the volleyball team finally got its coverage: A three-fourths-page report on how bad they are.

Regarding the band: Personally, I am so sick of the Wabash Cannonball I can't stand it. Perhaps that's the problem.

I want to know how much beer Project Wellness could have bought with the money they wasted on those stupid ads.

I should have gotten out of Kansas a long time ago since people started defending hicks.

I would cheer for any song the K-State band played, because they are awesome.

The band played Ricky Martin two weeks in a row. They might as well play "Mambo No. 5" for the next two games.

Instead of spending so much money on shuttle buses, we should replace all the sidewalks with those moving ones like they have in airports.

I just wanted to remind everyone that uses the crosswalks that when you're at a lighted crosswalk and it shows the little, red-lighted guy, that means you can't go.

I'd like to congratulate Taco Hut on 35 years of great service.

VOICES in the Hale STACKS

Journey through Hale Library reveals darker side reminiscent of tale found in 'The Blair Witch Project'

ADAM HAYES/COLLEGIAN

Disclaimer: Just one more rip-off of this old, tired theme. Just one. And if you haven't seen the movie, don't proceed any further. Really. I mean it.

In October 1998, three students disappeared in Hale Library while writing a research paper. One year later, their backpacks were found.

Becky: Finally, Hale Library. Crisp chill in the air. Perfect day to do research.

Chad: Y'know, I really wish you'd stop taping us reading books.

Becky: The camcorder is a birthday present.

Chad: Don't you have a single thing better to do than watch videotape of us getting calluses thumbing through books?

Matt: Probably not.

Becky: I find it intriguing. You know, how the very act of observing something changes it, somehow. You know Heisenberg?

Chad: Is he the kid from Goodnow with the glasses?

Becky: No.

Chad: Oh. No, then.

(Scene: Chad eats a sandwich in the Bookplate Cafe while Matt feeds change into a vending machine in the background.)

Becky: So, Chad, tell us what you're doing research on.

Chad (rolling eyes): Uh, Beck, you know full well what we're....

Becky: Tell us.

Chad (sighing): We're doing a paper for History of Occult and Witchcraft on some sort of spirit rumored to have lurked in Farrell Library, you know, the library before Hale.

(Matt grabs machine and starts shaking it violently.)

Becky: And you're looking forward to this project ... why?

Chad: Because the sooner I get it done, the sooner I get to Aggieville.

(Scene: Chad and Matt are leaning on either end of the circulation desk. A female clerk is doing her best to keep a straight face while glancing back and forth between Chad, Matt and the camera.)

Becky: So, tell us what you know about the ghosts here on campus.

Clerk: You mean the football team's offense?

Chad: That one's already been documented.

Clerk: Well, there's one in East Stadium, I know. And I kept hearing about ... nah.

Matt: C'mon. You're on camera. Speak.

Clerk: Well ... there were rumors of seven students with library fines killed by a deranged librarian back in the 1940s.

Matt: Cool.

Clerk: Their bodies were chopped up and scattered in the stacks. Some shelvers say they still find fingers from time to time.

Chad: What would you do if you found some?

Clerk: Lost and found. We don't have a separate box for body parts. It hasn't come up enough.

Chad: Good thing.

(Scene: the library stacks. Chad is glancing down at the back of an old card catalog entry on which he has scribbled a call number. Matt is just glancing around at all of the books and muttering to himself.)

Chad: If you'd printed off the books on the printer, you'd be able to read the list.

Matt: I'll take a railroad spike in the forehead before I use that stupid Wildcat Card just to print off some list of books. (Sighs.) Military science books. Are we getting any closer?

Chad: It's just down this way. Becky, you've got the map, right?

Chad: Good. Without that map, we're screwed.

Matt: This is stack level E, isn't it?

Chad: Of course it is.

Matt: You're sure.

Chad: I'm so sure I'm positive.

(Camera zooms in on shelf with book titled "Patton.")

Becky: I still think these are all military-science books.

Chad: Let's relax for a second. I've walked too far.

Matt: Dude, next time we're taking the elevator.

(Scene: Chad is looking directly into the camera lens and pointing behind him.)

Chad: Do you see that? Tell me you see that!

(Camera zooms in on three large piles of books surrounding the trio.)

Matt: Man, that's a lot of books.

Chad: When the hell did that get here? We just sat down for a few minutes!

Matt: Maybe they were already here.

Becky (shaky): How would we have, like, just ... took a break in the middle of three piles of books, just by coincidence?

Matt: It's a library, Becky. These things happen.

Chad: Let's get out of here. Becky. Map.

Becky: Ummm. ...

Chad (turning and giving the camera his icy cold stare): Becky. Map.

Becky: Let's go this way.

Chad: Map. Now.

Becky: Let's just go.

Chad: Becky, put down the damn camera and answer me a question: Where's the map?

Becky: Follow me.

(Group trudges through the stacks. Their progress is halted by a moaning noise. All three freeze in place.)

Matt: What the hell was that?

Chad: Dying dog?

Becky: In a library?

Matt: Let's keep walking. Bet I got a wheel lock by now.

(Trudging continues, but stops again when a baby's cries echo through the stacks.)

Chad: That's not a dog.

Matt: We are leaving. We are leaving right now.

Becky: I don't like this place.

Matt: Next time, I'm staying the hell home and using the Web.

(Trio ambles quickly through stacks and stacks, pausing when they come to a set of stairs.)

Matt: Up or down?

Becky: I don't like stairs.

Matt: If we take the stairs we'll eventually either get to the top or the basement.

Chad: I'm amazed at your grasp of spatial concepts.

Becky: I'm so tired of stairs.

(Sound of growling, shrieking from deep in the stacks.)

All: Let's go down.

(Camera shakes and loses focus as the group throttles down several flights of stairs and comes to a rest.)

Chad: I think we should take a vote.

Matt: On what?

Chad: All in favor of forgetting the paper and just getting home?

Matt and Becky: Aye.

Chad: Motion carried, let's motor. Becky. Map.

Becky: Matt has it.

Matt: What?

Becky: You have the map.

Matt: I gave it back to you.

Becky: Like hell you did.

Matt: Did you just get us lost?

Chad: We're in a library. How lost can we be?

Matt: Will you stop defending her all the time?

Chad: I've had enough of your lip, greek boy!

Matt: You're goin' down, dorm boy!

Becky: People! Stop it! Stop it! This isn't accomplishing anything! Let's just get out of here. Let's kill each other later. Let's just go this way.

(Group trudges through more stacks. After several minutes and assorted grumbles and profane mutterings from the group, the camera zooms in and focuses on a book titled "Patton" on the edge of a shelf.)

Becky: Oh, God. Oh, God.

Matt: What? What the hell?

Becky (convulsing in sobs): It's the same book. It's the same book.

(Much later. Chad has a day's worth of stubble. He's gnawing on a jumbo-size Tootsie Roll and looking at the camera.)

Becky: This your first time in the stacks?

Chad: In a while. Checked out a book from here in '97. It was late getting back.

Becky: I did that once, too. But I never got a note.

Chad: Me neither. Guess they forgot about us.

Becky: Wow. We beat the system, I guess.

Chad: Yeah, I guess so. ... Sheesh, how long does it take a greek to go to the bathroom?

Becky: Is that a riddle or a rhetorical question?

Chad: Where the hell's Matt?

Becky: Where's the bathroom?

Chad: It was just down this way. ...

(Becky and Chad slough through the stacks for a few minutes.)

Chad: It was right here. ...

(Matt's cries of pain ripple through the stacks.)

Becky: That's Matt.

Chad (shouting): Matt! Where the hell are you?

(Camera pans and tilts until it focuses on a scrap of cloth in the distance. Becky runs toward it, carrying camera. The cloth is a remnant of Matt's sweatshirt. Becky unwraps the sweatshirt and finds assorted, unidentifiable viscera and a parking ticket inside. Becky recoils in terror. Chad is still shouting in the background.)

Chad: Where the hell could he be?

Becky: Let's just go. The custodians will take care of him.

Chad: What?

Becky. Nothing. Let's just go.

(Becky and Chad are alone in the basement of the library. Chad is peering through the window to the outside.)

Chad: So damn ironic. It's so close, but we can't get there from here. If I had a buck for every set of doors that should be in here. Why aren't there stairs on the other end of the building? Did M.C. Escher design this place? Pretty? Maybe. But I'd give my left arm for a linear path to where I want to go right now.

(Becky backs up until Chad becomes inaudible. She turns the camera around until her hazel right eye comes into focus.)

Becky: I just want to apologize to Chad's mom, and Matt's housemom, and my mom, and to Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock and to Head of Circulation Kathleen Wisneski. I am so sorry! Because it was my fault. I was the one who brought them here. I was the one that said, "Let's take the stairs." I was the one who said that we were not lost. It was my fault, because it was my project. I am so scared! I don't know what's in here. We are going to die in here! I am so scared! (Crackling noise in the background) What was that?

Chad: Oh. Sorry.

(Much later. Chad is throttling toward the stairs. Becky is struggling to keep pace.)

Chad: He's in the Bookplate Cafe! I heard him! Let's go! It's open 24 hours! We've got to hurry!

Becky: Chad!

(Camera locks on Chad, who is standing near the wall, staring down at a library fine in his hand. His eyes are bulging out of their sockets. The camera is knocked out of Becky's hands by an unseen force and rattles to the floor, where it focuses on the far wall.)

Some things never change: Manhattan inviting even after graduation

What first surprises you is how easy it is to drive into town, just to coast through the shady streets of Manhattan like your leaving 10 months ago was just a trip to the corner store for milk.

The trees in City Park are a little taller. Some of the bars in Aggieville have changed names again. There still are just two or three restaurants worth considering. And, even on a campus that seems perpetually in construction, Anderson Hall still symbolizes — if a bit threadbarely these days — high academic aspirations.

But you still know your way around and, driving up Mid-Campus Drive, a convenient parking space on campus appears readied for you, as if to suggest the campus needs you as much as you have needed it.

In an odd sort of coincidence, this university fulfilled more of my expectations than perhaps even I intended. You wonder how an institution dedicated to higher learning often can be so frustratingly antiquated and willing to justify ignorance while simultaneously allowing, even forcing, one of its students into the role of its fiercest critic.

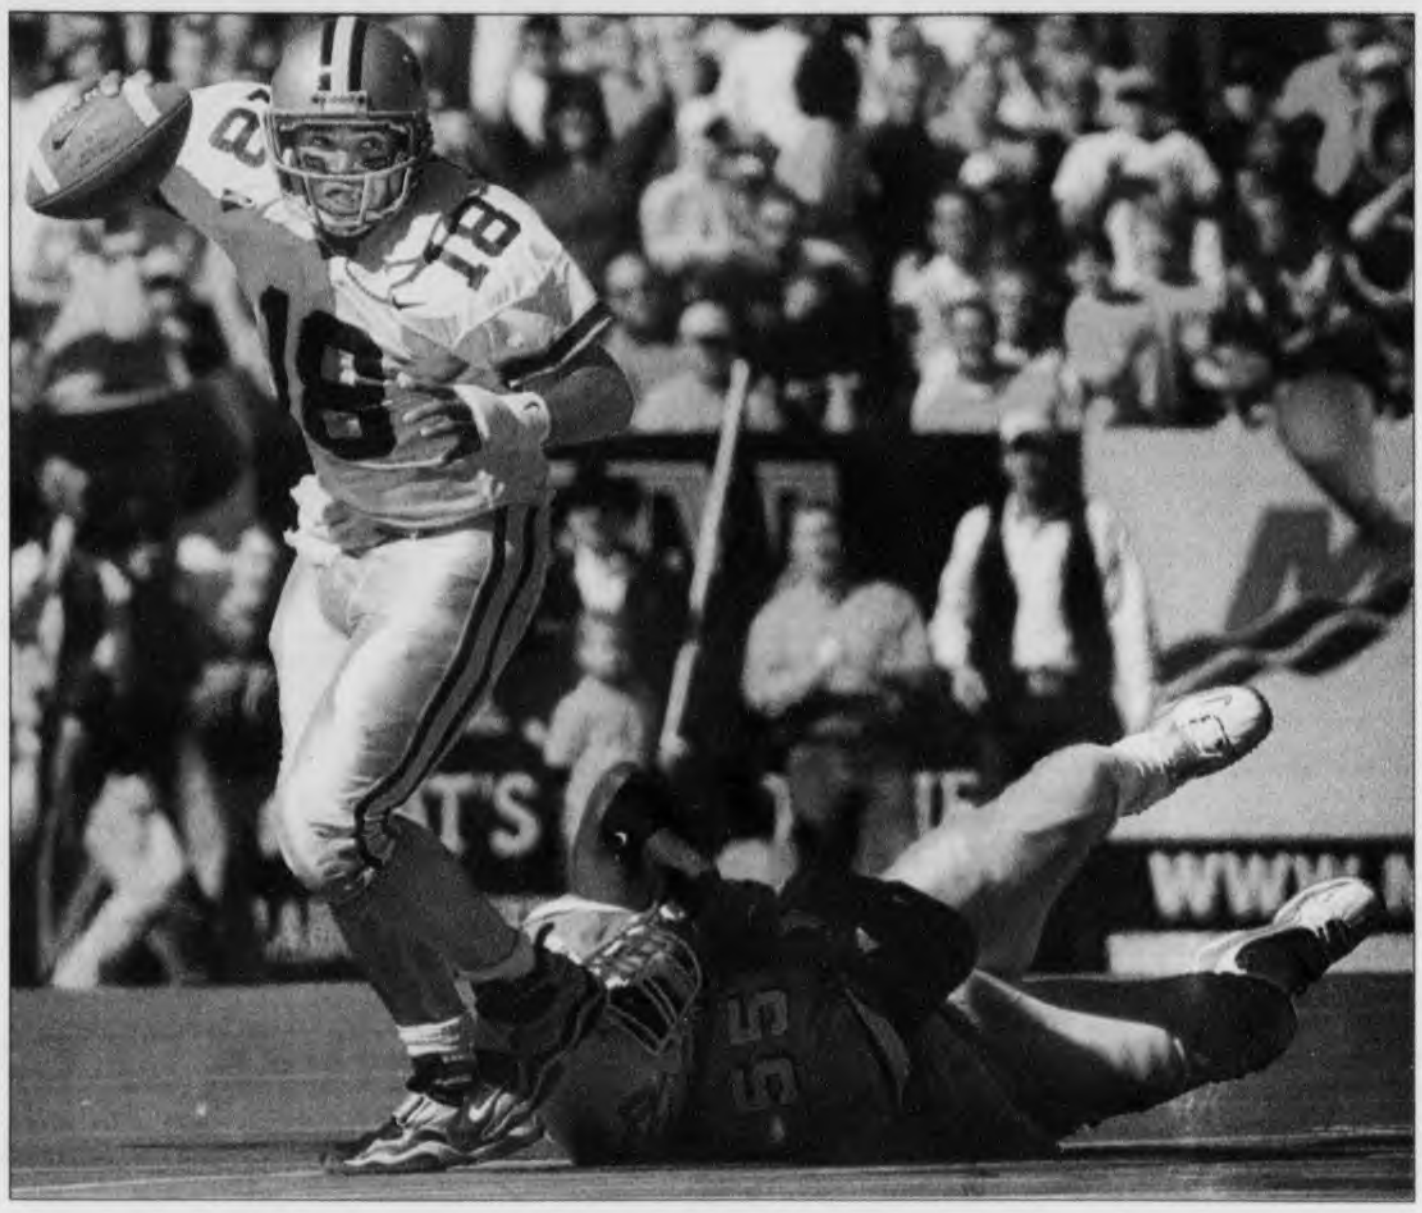
It has been said that only a city's own residents legitimately can hate their city, like it's an urban right to complain about your streets, parks and buildings. That must be true for universities. For example, the editor of the school newspaper at the University of Texas can criticize his campus, but ill-advised presidents from out-of-state universities cannot.

For the true student, K-State is a challenge. It's a push-and-pull between the tradition-bound and the new. Much like the business world, you risk much to walk out on a limb and shake off the leaves. To criticize is to draw a line in the sand.

In business, this might permanently sever legal agreements. In higher education, you hope it acts as a point of reference in a larger philosophical discussion.

So there you are walking around the campus, instinctively cataloging even the most minor change in the environment: a new tree, sign or building. You realize the inherent organic nature of the campus that eludes the annually returning student: the way Fiedler Hall seems almost finished while the much-discussed Alumni Center's site near Memorial Stadium seems as barren as its intended design.

And in a predominately transitory city like Manhattan, you wonder if, after you graduate, you come back to K-State for the people you think you will see or for the place itself, the perception being that some things — even organic ones — never change. People show their age (and have e-mail accounts), a campus does not.



A campus is in many ways a state of mind. You see what you want to see, you react to your perception of what the campus demands of you. The campus is a personal reality.

For me, K-State — its buildings and open spaces — were the physical embodiment of that personal reality; these wonderful, old limestone buildings are like bookmarks for my brain. I wonder how genuinely proud and awed the crowd of students must have been at the dedication of such an important building as Anderson. There weren't many other buildings on campus for comparison at the time, but I would like to think even the critics secretly harbored some passion for its limestone bell tower.

Assuming a majority of us want an Anderson might be too much, what with the drive toward the techno-crazed virtual campus. And, of course, chance does not guarantee everyone their own Anderson.

As for me, I still drive onto campus and wonder when I'll be able to find my Anderson Hall — when I will be surprised to find something that lives up to my experience at K-State.

Quarterback pitches best game of season, leads Wildcats to win against Oklahoma State

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER

Quarterback Jonathan Beasley played what easily could be considered the best game of his career, guiding K-State to another come-from-behind victory Saturday, 44-21 over Oklahoma State at Stillwater, Okla.

Beasley passed for 311 yards and four touchdowns, completing 13 of 25 passes. He also ran nine times for 68 yards and two more scores.

"That shows a lot of courage. That shows a lot of character," head coach Bill Snyder said. "Jonathan played poorly last week and was openly criticized for not playing well, and came back. And I thought he did a very nice job, very commendable job, this week.

"I was happy for him and certainly pleased that he was able to play as well and some of the fine decisions that he made."

The No. 6 Cats (7-0, 4-0) fell behind 21-0 early in the game, when junior quarterback Tony Lindsay orchestrated three scoring drives for the Cowboys (3-3, 1-2) . Lindsay, playing for the first time since the season opener because of a knee injury, ran the first two touchdowns in from 1 and 5 yards out. Then, to open the second quarter, Lindsay tossed a 24-yard scoring strike to receiver Ethan Howell.

"You have to give them credit," defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said. "They came out with heck of a scheme. They had us on our heels.

"The thing that I'm proud of is that our kids didn't lose faith in us making adjustments. We made them, and once we made them, our kids responded. I think that's the sign of a good football team."

Staring at a 21-point deficit for the second time this season, the Cats were down but not out, linebacker Ben Leber said.

"I don't know if we panicked or anything," Leber said. "We had all the confidence in our coaches to figure out what's going on and get things figured out.

"I didn't see much panic, because it was only the first quarter."

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The backups just keep on coming.

In a season marred by injuries to key players on offense, K-State wide receiver George Williams became the latest to slide successfully into a position vacated by an injury in the Wildcats' 44-21 win against Oklahoma State.

Williams was on the receiving end of 146 of junior quarterback Jonathan Beasley's career-best 311 yards passing. The 6-foot-1-inch junior was filling in as the Wildcats' third receiver for junior Martez Wesley and sophomore Brandon Clark, both sidelined with injuries.

Until Saturday, Williams hadn't caught a pass since the second week of the season against UTEP and had only three catches all year, but his patience is what helped him finally reach the field, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said.

"He sat in my office a week and a half ago and couldn't understand why he wasn't playing more," Hudson said. "He just hasn't learned the system, but he's been getting better and better."

Williams demonstrated his knowledge of the system when he described his responsibilities on his 56-yard catch in the second quarter that set up the Wildcats' first score and ignited a K-State offense that had mustered 43 yards of total offense before his catch.

"We had trips off to our left side," Williams said. "My job is to get on the inside of the safety, and if he doesn't play me the correct way, I run the post on him."

"He didn't play me the correct way, and I got open," Williams said.

That reception confirmed players' and coaches' beliefs that it was just a matter of time before Williams would break through.

"George has been doing it all year in practice," sophomore wide receiver Aaron Lockett said. "He was fortunate to get his opportunity, and he's making the most of it."

Williams' transition from Butte College in California, the community college where he caught 49 passes for 1,036 yards last year, to K-State has been smooth, due to his treatment from the other receivers.

"The guys welcomed me in with open arms," Williams said. "I just feel like one of the family now — I just go out and make plays."

As with most community-college transfers,

Cats' hearts provide edge needed to win

■ Victories on road show it takes more than strength, speed to win.

In the world of sports sometimes it's not always the bigger, faster or more famous guys who win. Sometimes victories don't occur because of long touchdown passes or 100-yard rushing performances.

Sometimes, victories come from a place that is least expected — from that red, pumping, cardiac machine doctors call a heart.

K-State's 44-21 victory over Oklahoma State personified the Wildcats' season like no other game. This K-State squad is a comeback team — but not just in game situations.

These Wildcats take a hit and keep on ticking. You're down by three touchdowns, who cares? No matter what, they will find a way to win.

Oklahoma State spun off 21 first-half points that made Mark Simoneau and the K-State defense look like Mary Poppins and the Mickey Mouse Club. But, just like in Ames, Iowa, and Austin, Texas, the Wildcats made the visiting club's home stadium look like a reenactment of Custer's Last Stand.

The defense sacked, slaughtered and digested Cowboys quarterback Tony Lindsay, forcing four interceptions — five turnovers overall — and allowing the Cowboys past midfield only twice after their first three scores.

The defense's performance was all Jonathan Beasley needed. Beasley, a much-criticized underachiever, humiliated the No. 2 defense in the Big 12. He passed for four touchdowns and ran for two more. For a split second, Beasley almost made people think, "Bishop who?"

What resulted was 44 straight Wildcat points. With Nebraska losing to Texas and the Bowl Championship Series race heating up to a blazing inferno, talks of a repeat of the 1998 season arise once again.

As we all know, this Wildcat squad doesn't have Michael Bishop or Darnell McDonald, or even Jeff Kelly or Travis Ochs. Despite possibly being less talented than last season's Big 12 North Division Champions, this K-State team has something last year's didn't — pure, unadulterated heart.

"I think we're better," strong safety Jarrod Cooper said of the 1999 squad, compared with last year's. "Everybody wants it more. When we get down, it was 21-0, and there wasn't one person on the sideline that was like, 'Man, forget it, let's get this over with.' We were like, 'Man, we're losing. Let's go and let's do something about it.'

"I don't know, it doesn't matter. Take shots at us. We'll be underdogs forever, but we'll come and get you."

Amen.

From the beginning of the season to a 44-point comeback victory Saturday, K-State has had to rally from almost being down for the count.

The Cats lost eight offensive starters. Defensive coordinator Phil Bennett lost his wife in a tragic accident. The Cats have had more than 10 players injured, including stars Frank Murphy and David Allen.

Instead of throwing in the towel, this team made a comeback. K-State is 7-0 and once again is in the hunt for a national title.

Not only are the Wildcats talented and smart, but their heart has gotten them this far.

The BCS rankings are scheduled to be released tonight, and every college football writer in the country has picks and analysis on who will play in the national-championship game. Penn State, Florida State and Virginia Tech are atop everyone's list. Just for the record, the BCS rankings should shape up with Virginia Tech grabbing the top spot, then Penn State at No. 2, Florida State at No. 3, K-State at No. 4 and Tennessee or Florida at No. 5.

What if there were a poll that measured the adversity and heart of a team? A poll that doesn't measure a team's statistics, its strength of schedule, or the talent it has, but measures a team's will to win despite disaster?

So, without further ado, here's my presentation of the new BCS — the Big Cardiac-muscle

Volleyball team defeats Sooners

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 12 K-State volleyball team rebounded Saturday against the Oklahoma Sooners after losing to Baylor last Wednesday, ending the Cats' nine-match winning streak.

In game one at Oklahoma Field House, K-State (15-3, 9-1) fell early at 5-2, then watched as the Sooners (6-14, 1-9) racked up six consecutive points to take a commanding 11-2 lead.

K-State battled back to within four points at 12-8, using a 6-1 scoring run. Unfortunately, the Cats couldn't stay alive as they lost 15-9.

Leading 4-1 in [illegible]d game and then due to the Soone[illegible]ght, K-State saw its lead sl[illegible]o two at 7-5.

After r[illegible]ling off four straight points to control 11-5, the Cats sealed the win at 15-6.

However, K-State couldn't finish off the Sooners. In game three, Oklahoma took an early 6-1 lead.

K-State made yet another turnaround and tied the game at 7. Following the tie score, K-State made eight consecutive points to win it 15-7.

In the fourth and decisive game, the Cats saw themselves in the hole again at 4-1 but rallied to take their first lead at 6-4. Although Oklahoma tied the game at both six and seven, K-State ended up pulling away to take the game and the match 15-8.

K-State was paced by senior outside hitter Dawn Cady, who totaled 20 kills and eight digs.

Sophomore outside hitter Liz Wegner helped out as well, recording 14 kills and six digs.

The Cats' next action is Wednesday at Lubbock, Texas, when they face the Texas Tech Red Raiders.

second quarter, helped partly by a 67-yard drive that was highlighted by a 56-yard completion from Beasley to George Williams, which put the ball on the Cowboy's' 6-yard line.

Beasley eventually capped the drive with a 1-yard run that put the Cats on the board.

On Oklahoma State's ensuing possession, running back Nathan Simmons dropped the ball just before reaching the line of scrimmage.

Senior linebacker Mark Simoneau fell on the ball at the Cowboys' 17. Three plays later, Beasley connected with Quincy Morgan for the 17-yard score.

K-State then forced the Cowboys to a three-and out possession, but after their punt and Lamar Chapman's 12-yard return, K-State was given an additional 15 yards because of a face-mask penalty that put the ball on the Cats' 35-yard line.

Five plays later, Beasley connected with sophomore Aaron Lockett on a 35-yard touchdown pass to tie the game.

It was Lockett's first touchdown reception of the season.

Considering Beasley's performance his best thus far, Snyder said he thought it would be fair to assume the offensive line played well, too.

"I'd like to think they did a very fine job," Snyder said.

"I didn't like some of the holding calls that we got. I have to look at the film, but it would appear that at first blush again, that that's as good a performance with our offensive line that we've had."

Now, with the Cats having to rally for victories three times this season, Snyder said it goes back to the team's preparation each week.

"It would tell me that we would need to go back and thoroughly scrutinize our preparation," Snyder said.

Game notes

■ Hall coninues powerful running 27 carries for 127 yards, Hall had his second 100 yards rushing game in a row. Last week, Hall ran for 195 yards.

■ Comeback Cats do it again K-State's comeback win over Oklahoma State tied the school mark for largest comeback. Earlier, the Cats overcame a 28-7 deficit at Iowa State to win 35-28.

■ Beasley continues to grow into position Quarterback Jonathan Beasley's passing performance established career highs in yards and receptions. Beasley passed for 311 yards on 13 of 25 pass attempts, while rushing for 68 yards on nine carries.

■ Rheem moves onto school scoring list Place kicker Jamie Rheem moved into 12th on K-State's career scoring list with 7 points scored Saturday. Rheem made four extra points and a 30-yard field goal. Rheem now has 116 total points.

■ Moving on up Not only did K-State move from No.7 to No. 6, it also moved into the top spot in the Big 12 Conference standings with its win over the Cowboys, combined with Nebraska's 24-20 loss to the Texas Longhorns on Saturday.

■ Second-half team K-State might struggle in the first half, but in the second the Cats have outscored opponents 158-3.

■ Howard sets record for sacks K-State defensive end Darren Howard is now the school-record holder in career sacks with 28.5. With 13:30 remaining in the game, Howard sacked Tony Lindsay for the mark. Howard entered the game needing one sack to move past Nyle Wiren, who played at K-State from 1993 to 1996.

■ Interception streak The Cats' defense extended its consecutive-game streak with an interception to 15 games. Dyshod Carter intercepted twice, while Travis Litton and Mark Simoneau each got one.

WILLIAMS

Williams was surprised how much different playing football is at the Division I level.

"It's a lot faster-paced game," Williams said. "The DBs are coached better and they know how to position themselves to get interceptions."

Ask Williams where he fits in with the other wide receivers, and he'll say that he's a little bit of everyone.

"I would consider myself both a possession and speed receiver," Williams said. "I can turn on the burners if I have to."

Although he hasn't been timed recently in the 40-yard dash, Williams said he is in the low 4.4 to high 4.3 range.

With Wesley expected to return eventually, Williams' role again could diminish temporarily, but coaches said they are convinced he will see extensive time in the future.

"We know what George can do," Hudson said. "We've just got to make sure George is going in the right direction and that will come with time," Hudson said.

Although he sees room for improvement, Williams said he's starting to feel comfortable with his place in the offense.

"I'm ready to get the rest of the season rolling," Williams said. "I'm assignment sound now, and I'm ready to catch the ball and make plays."

Series, that is. The new computer (or maybe not by a computer, but whatever I say it is) ranking system that measures a team's heart.

Here are the top five:

1. K-State. They are the comeback Cats, but they will be close to the top on everyone's real BCS rankings. That's quite impressive.

2. East Carolina. The Pirates aren't a perennial powerhouse by any means, but they have compiled a 6-1 record. The Pirates recorded an emotional 27-23 victory over Miami while the rest of Greenville, N.C., was recovering from a devastating hurricane.

3. KU. The Jayhawks started off playing a strong game against Notre Dame, but after being mauled by several critical injuries, playing second- and third-stringers at several positions and fighting back talk of Terry Allen's final season, the Jayhawks still won't die. KU almost took out Texas A&M at College Station, then blanked Missouri at Lawrence, making the fans bring down the goal posts.

4. Wisconsin. The Badgers lost to Cincinnati and Michigan after many expected a national-championship run. Instead of giving in, Wisconsin shocked Michigan State and Ohio State. Plus, running back Ron Dayne might have as much heart as any Division I player.

5. Texas. No Ricky Williams, no problem. The Longhorns overcame disappointing losses against North Carolina State and K-State to upend the powerful Nebraska Cornhuskers, igniting their postseason hopes and possibly ending the Huskers' national-title dreams.

Longhorns dent Nebraska's national title hopes

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUSTIN, Texas — Nebraska will be left to pick up the pieces after Texas upset the Cornhuskers 24-20 Saturday.

No. 3 Nebraska (6-1, 3-1 Big 12 Conference) took a 13-3 halftime lead, but quarterback Major Applewhite rallied No. 18 Texas (6-2, 3-1) for 21 second-half points to hand Nebraska its first loss of the year.

The Longhorns ran their winning streak over the Huskers to three straight games and remain the only Big 12 foe Nebraska hasn't beaten.

"It's hard to swallow," said Nebraska tight end Tracey Wistrom, whose team outgained Texas 429-275 in total offense, but committed three turnovers. "It's one of the worst feelings in the world. I feel sick right now and not because I feel like we got beat today, but because we beat ourselves."

Nebraska head coach Frank Solich, who is 0-2 against Texas, said the loss is hard for his team.

"This one hurts a lot because this team came into the game undefeated and wanted to stay that way," Solich said. "They've worked very hard for it."

Like several teammates, Nebraska quarterback Eric Crouch minced no words this week about his desire to beat Texas.

"I never really thought that Texas could beat us three times in a row, but they've played great football," said Crouch, who completed 12 of 20 pass attempts for 204 yards. "Today, it just seemed like they beat us because of our mistakes, but you've got to credit them because they played hard and they played real physical."

Even after the loss, Solich stressed that Nebraska still has plenty to play for this year.

By winning their final four regular season games, the Huskers still could capture the Big 12 North Division title and gain a spot in the Big 12 Championship game Dec. 4 at San Antonio.

"They are tremendously disappointed, but we still have a very good football team," Solich said.

"There's only two ways our team can go from here. We can go forward or we can start sliding back. We will not let this team slide back."

Nebraska safety Clint Finley said the Huskers' hopes for a national championship remain alive.

"I don't think this changes anything," Finley said. "If we win out, play hard and keep a positive attitude, you never know what can happen."

GHOSTLY TALES

4th-annual Fort Riley Ghost Tour allows community to explore spooks, ghosts of post's haunted past

By TANNER EHMKE
Kansas State Collegian

Fort Riley is home not only to America's Army, but to many legends that haunt the century-old structures.

More than 700 people toured Fort Riley on Sunday night for the fourth-annual Fort Riley Ghost Tour. The two-mile tour of legendary haunted houses is filled with accounts from those who live on the base. The stories range from the 1800s to present.

"The crowds really get into it," said Renee Bryant, Fort Riley resident and one of the tour guides. "It's a great time for the ghosts to come out."

The stories range from strange bumps in the night to the famed "buckskin ghost," a dweller of one of the homes on the base, seen wearing buckskin clothing and changing the TV station while the family is watching. There are accounts of another ghost who waters the plants in the attic in a retired hospital that has been converted to a home.

"The people seem to enjoy it," Bryant said. "The fact that all of the stories are actually true simply adds that extra sense of awe."

One house, built in 1889, is the home of a ghost who always opens the window above the kitchen sink, said Karen Kryschtal, resident of the house from 1990 to 1993. This puzzled her and her husband, since they could barely open the window 6 inches. Every morning, the window was open no less than 1-1/2 feet. There were no children in the house, puzzling the couple further as to who was able to unlatch the window and lift it open. The only other residents were three dogs.

"The kitchen would be cold every morning because the window was open," Kryschtal said. "The plants near the window were dying. That's what really upset me."

Cathy Graves, junior in pre-health, guided groups across the base.

The buckskin ghost is one of the favorites, she said. It is friendly to children. It plays the piano while people are outside, blows on the back of people's necks and has been seen standing next to the television. Children even will leave out cookies for it. The people who live in the house knows it exists, because they all have had the same experiences with it, she said.

Andrea Hanson stands on the porch of the Custer House on Sunday evening as a tour group listens to her recounting ghost stories. The tours highlighted many of the buildings and houses on Fort Riley thought to be haunted.
Michael Young/Collegian

There have been numerous accounts of a dark-cloaked woman wearing chains and walking across the Artillery Parade Field on clear nights. Some say she drowned herself when her fiance was killed in battle.

In another story, a military policeman quit working at the fort after an encounter with a mysterious man wearing blue clothes and sitting in the basement of a building on the fort. After the man was asked to leave because of closing hours, he disappeared in a cloud of smoke.

A second tour of the haunted houses will be tonight at Fort Riley. A book on its ghosts, "The Ghosts of Fort Riley," is available for $6. For more information, contact Lorna Loring at (785) 784-4145 or e-mail lmloring@oz-online.net.

Counselor's dog helps students cope with depression, anxiety, loss of parents

Dog named co-winner of 1998 Pet of Year award for distinguished community service

By SHARLA ROWLEY
Kansas State Collegian

Zipper became a close friend to many middle school children

The golden retriever's owner, a counselor at a middle school in Independence, Kan., took Zipper to school with her and used him to help troubled kids.

"The kids would talk to Zipper when they wouldn't talk to an adult," Dr. Richard Barta, his former veterinarian, said.

Throughout 1998, Zipper helped students cope with depression, anxiety, anger and the loss of a parent, Barta said.

"Zipper's owner would come in and tell me all these great things he was doing with the kids," Barta said. "I started thinking I should nominate him for Pet of the Year."

Zipper was a co-winner of the Kansas Veterinary Medical Association 1998 Pet of the Year, an award that recognizes animals who have provided a distinguished service or have performed in an extraordinary manner on behalf of an individual or a community.

"This award was started to give animals the credit they deserve. So many times they are not just pets. Companion animals have a special place in our hearts," Dr. David Ripple, president of KVMA, said.

In the past, veterinarians who thought they had special clients nominated them, Ripple said.

"But we encourage anyone that knows of or thinks they have an extraordinary pet to nominate them," Ripple said.

The Pet of the Year selected by the KVMA will be honored during ceremonies at the Association's Annual Convention on Jan. 14 at the Capitol Plaza Hotel in Topeka.

More Info

If you want to nominate a special animal, send your nomination with a description of the meritorious conduct (100 words or less) by Nov. 16 to Dr. David Whitehair, KVMA Awards Committee, 816 SW Tyler, Suite 200, Topeka, KS 66612-1635 or fax the information to (785)-233-2534.

Manhattan Mercury appoints Ned Seaton general manager

The Manhattan Mercury has appointed a new general manager.

Ned Seaton, former news editor for The Mercury, took on the job of general manager last week. Seaton has worked for The Mercury since 1996 and has been news editor since December of the same year.

Seaton said the position of general manager is different from the position of news editor because he will be dealing with the business side of the newspaper now as well as the news side.

"I am going to have responsibility to the business side of things as well as the functioning of the news department," Seaton said.

Ned Seaton was named general manager by editor in chief Edward Seaton.

Edward Seaton said he had been fulfilling the positions of both editor in chief and general manager and thought there was a need for a position of general manager.

He said he appointed Ned Seaton general manager because he knew that he would do a good job at it.

"Ned is going to move out of the newsroom and on to some special projects as general manager," Edward Seaton said.

Ned Seaton said he decided to take the job of general manager because he is interested in the future of The Mercury and thought that it was a position that needed to be filled as well.

"Since The Mercury is owned by my family I obviously have some stake in the future of it and quite a bit of interest as well," Ned Seaton said.

K-State's Sigma Chi chapter celebrates 50th anniversary

The K-State chapter of Sigma Chi fraternity will celebrate its 50th anniversary on campus with activities Nov. 12-14 in Manhattan.

"While the actual anniversary dates are Dec. 2 and 3, we have selected the weekend of Nov. 12-14 for our anniversary celebration," said Jack Marker, a K-State Sigma Chi alum who is coordinating the activities.

Activities for Sigma Chi members are scheduled for the entire weekend. The Sigma Chi fraternity house is located at 1224 Fremont Ave.

The fraternity house was built to replace the former one that burned in June 1981.

Tom Roberts, assistant dean of engineering, said Sigma Chi has maintained a continuous campus presence since it received its national charter in 1949.

K-State offers scholarships for students to study abroad

Eight K-State students will have the opportunity to study abroad with paid tuition and living expenses.

The opportunity is through a K-State study-abroad exchange program scholarship.

Eight scholarships are available for students to study in Giessen or Munich, Germany; or Zurich, Switzerland. Students must pay for travel and personal expenses.

To be eligible for the scholarship, students must attend K-State, have completed a fourth-level German language class and have a 3.0 grade point average. Carol Miller, assistant professor of modern languages, said all majors are encouraged to apply for the scholarships.

The deadline for the scholarship is Nov. 5. Students interested should contact the Office of International Programs for more information.

K-State students to receive help testing market for jobs

K-State's education majors can test the job market at special events sponsored by K-State's Career and Employment Services and the College of Education.

The events include a mock interview clinic and a career fair with some of the state's largest school districts from across the Midwest.

Traditionally, sizable career fairs for education majors have been conducted in the spring. But times are changing, said Tim Henderson, assistant director of Career and Employment Services.

K-State's education career fair will feature more than 40 school districts and educational cooperatives and agencies from Kansas and other states. The fair will be from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Nov. 12 in the Main Ballroom of the K-State Student Union.

To help students hone their interviewing skills before the career fair, a mock interview clinic will be offered from 1 to 5 p.m. Nov. 11 at Holtz Hall. Students will be interviewed by a representative of one of the participating school districts.

Students can sign up for the mock interview clinic starting Nov. 1, using Career and Employment Services' new online interview sign-up procedure. Students must have a résumé and be registered with Career and Employment Services to participate in the clinic.

the book was intended for Jessie's children and grandchildren, so they could live and learn from her mistakes.

Foveaux had eight children, 16 grandchildren, 23 great-grandchildren and seven great-great grandchildren.

"She was a wonderful lady — about the best mama anyone could have. The place won't be the same without the old gal," Marion Foveaux said.

Charles Kempthorne, Foveaux's former teacher, said he people like reading her book because it reminds them of themselves or their grandparents.

"She was a fine writer because she had the courage to be herself. One of the conditions of publication was that they shall not change the manuscript, except to correct spelling or factual errors," he said. "It has been published in seven or eight languages with several versions, and it is pretty much as she wrote it.

"She became the richest writer in Kansas at the age of 98, and the money didn't change her one bit," Kempthorne said.

Kempthorne met Foveaux through a program he taught at the Adult Learning Center called Harvest of Age, which was designed to teach older citizens how to write autobiographies.

"I didn't have to inspire her or teach her how to write," Kempthorne said. "She had a story to tell."

Karen Kitterman, Foveaux's granddaughter, said readers of "Any Given Day" related to the book as well as its historical detail.

"Older people couldn't believe the detail she gave, and the younger people were amazed that she could remember that much," she said. "They respected her for her memories.

"I was fascinated by the book to begin with. For me to hear her account — it just amazes me that she could survive that. Now I respect her even more."

Weber Hall 123 (Kansas State University)
In March of 1996, the U.S. Presidential candidate Pat Buchanan said on national television that he wasn't descended from apes, and he didn't think children should be taught that they are. Not a single U.S. journalist questioned him on this position. In 1999, the Kansas School Board removed evolution and discussions of the Big Band from its curriculum, in spite of the fact that these are not controversial scientific issues, and moreover, the alternatives disagree with observation. Lawrence Krauss will explore examples from the news, advertisements, TV shows and movies, as well as from his latest book, to discuss the difference between science and fiction and to explore how the distinction between sense and nonsense is becoming blurred in popular discourse.
The lecture will be part "tour" through the fascinating world of modern physics, part fun-filled examination of video clips, and part sober discussion of the various dangers facing modern society if we fail to learn the lessons science has taught us about the world. We must not be timid about offending sensibilities when those sensibilities are based on nonsense.

Ampitheater feel to a playhouse arena

A sold-out crowd shows its enthusiasm for 311 on Thursday night at the Uptown Theater.

JEFF COOPER/COLLEGIAN

311 overcomes theater's drawbacks to put on entertaining show in KC

BY JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Scheduling a high-energy rock act such as 311 in Kansas City, Mo.'s cramped, newly refurbished Uptown Theater on Thursday was definitely a mistake on the part of booking agents at Capricorn Records.

Security guards only could stand by and hope to curb the more serious crowd-surfing offenses as the sold-out crowd got a dose of the music that had been delayed more than an hour due to problems with barriers surrounding the stage. Any improvements made on the Uptown's interior during the last few weeks undoubtedly would show signs of the audience's enthusiasm during the almost two-hour performance.

JEFF COOPER/COLLEGIAN

S.A. Martinez, 311 vocalist, performs at the Uptown Theater in Kansas City, Mo.

"What a shitty place to have a rock show," said 311's lead vocalist, Nick Hexum, summing up the crowd's feelings concerning the no-smoking, $6-a-beer atmosphere.

While the location might not have fit the event, 311 has the ability to give an amphitheater feel to even the smallest playhouse. The five-man band's sound, which has survived six years of tours and evolving albums, has managed to retain fans as well as attract more, as the show's obviously underage crowd demonstrated.

The group is touring smaller venues around the United States to promote "Soundsystem," a compact disc with a release date originally slated for April and tour dates beginning in May. This six-month delay possibly could have been the catalyst for the Uptown crowd's fervor once 311 took the stage.

While "Soundsystem" selections were the focus of the evening, with new releases "Freeze Time" and "Come Original" eliciting the most promising responses, the majority of the show featured selections from 1993's "Music," 311's first album, and the group's 1995 self-titled disc. It just goes to show that no matter what the group continues to crank out, old radio favorites "Do You Right" and "Down" still will be the sing-along hits that keep the crowd involved.

Compared to past shows on tours such as the one promoting 1997's "Transistor," the Uptown concert paled in comparison. Hexum and fellow vocalist S.A. Martinez both showed the strains of their hectic tour schedule, with back-to-back dates spread over too wide an area. In one week, the group played six shows in three states. All that time trapped in a tour bus can't be good for 311's energy level.

"I've heard Nick's been sick. You can kind of tell by the way he's been singing, because his voice sounds a little scratchy," said Scott Coryell, an architect from 311's hometown of Omaha, Neb. "They only played at the Bottleneck for about an hour and a half last night."

Despite showing signs of fatigue early in the show, Hexum and Martinez managed to animate their audience and produce an evening the group could be proud of.

In regards to "Soundsystem," the best way to sum up the new album would be in Hexum's own words.

"If you were to combine our fourth album, 'Transistor,' with our first album, 'Music,' I think you'd come up with something like 'Soundsystem,'" he said.

After the dreamy, flowy tracks that make up "Transistor" were met with lukewarm reviews, 311 is back to prove it still knows how to give guitar-driven music an original twist. "Soundsystem" is laced with the kind of music that made the band the powerhouse it is today, with the group reverting to the harder, edgier sound that first propelled them into the alternative-rock spotlight. "Large in the Margin" is a personal favorite, with Hexum's voice a prominent feature over the booming backdrop bassist P-Nut provides.

"Soundsystem" does have its problems, however. The first radio single, "Come Original," is 311's all-call for its peers to strive for excellence in their music. Oddly enough, the song itself is a bit trite and repetitive. It's hard to point the finger at musicians with lyrical difficulties when your own song is nothing more than the phrase, "Come original, you got to come original, all entertainers, come original," repeated over and over until your stereo becomes a hated enemy.

All in all, lyrical issues aside, the vocal combo of Hexum and Martinez is a match made is heaven — 'nuff said. Each is completely familiar with the other's style: while Hexum takes control of stronger lyrics and dominates the majority of verses, Martinez feels more at home with each song's faster, rap-like beats that invade each work.

The Hexum/Martinez duo might be the backbone of the group, but the forceful stylings of bassist P-Nut gives each song the feel that is all 311. His hard edge, backed by fellow guitarist Tim Mahoney, dictate the direction of each track. Chad Sexton rounds out 311 with drum solos that begin in a concertgoer's chest and radiate out, turning even the most lukewarm attendees into involved listeners.

To sum up, fears concerning 311's descent into anonymity after "Transistor" are laid to rest with "Soundsystem." Fans should rest assured that 311 will be cranking out originals for many years to come.

To quote the man himself: "To all my friends, it's not the end. The earth has not swallowed me yet."

Halloween Midnight Madness to feature campus spooks

BY JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Perhaps the best way to celebrate the year's spookiest holiday is to spend an evening with K-State's resident ghost.

The Halloween presentation of Midnight Madness, one of K-State Theatre's impromptu performance programs, will be dedicated to Nick, the spirit who is rumored to haunt Memorial Stadium, said Chris Piatt, student coordinator of Midnight Madness and senior in theater.

Nick is said to be the wandering spirit of an athlete killed in a play gone awry during a football game more than 50 years ago.

Nick's ghost now is said to haunt the stadium and the many rooms the structure houses, including the Purple Masque Theatre, where each Midnight Madness performance takes place.

"We pay homage to Nick every year," Piatt said. "He's been a part of K-State Theatre longer than any of us have."

The Halloween performance of Midnight Madness will take place in the Purple Masque Theatre, located on the east side of Memorial Stadium, directly after the Thursday performance of "Death and the Maiden."

For more information regarding Midnight Madness performances, contact Chris Piatt or Aubrey Kershner, 532-6875.

Midnight Madness is a program designed to allow K-State's budding playwrights a chance to have their works read in an informal setting, Piatt said.

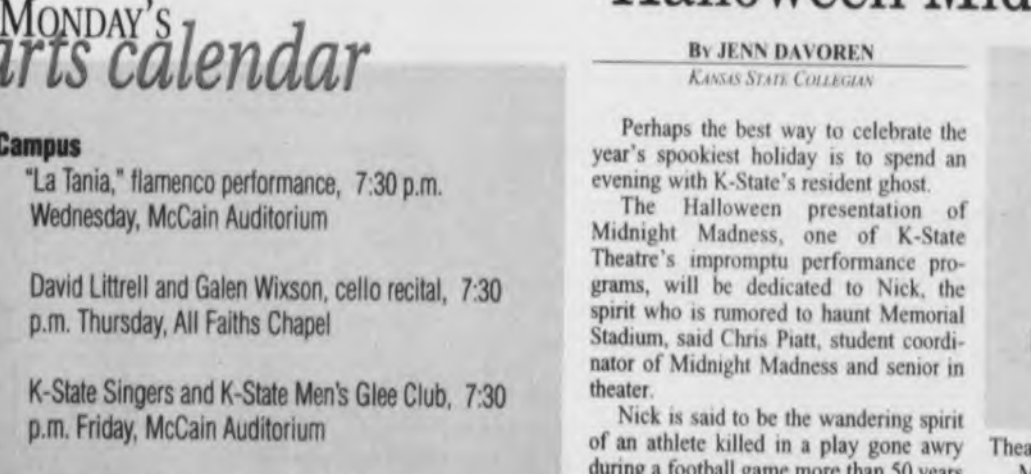
Writers sculpt a three- to five-page script either the day before or the day of the performance, keeping their work to a length that can be performed in about 10 minutes.

The students then present their efforts to the program's hosts before the evening's events begin, allowing the hosts time to pick performers out of the audience for each reading.

"We just throw the scripts on the stage and start picking them out to read for the audience," Piatt said. "Anybody who wants to can come and read these scripts. It's not strictly for people involved in the theater department. You just jump right up on stage."

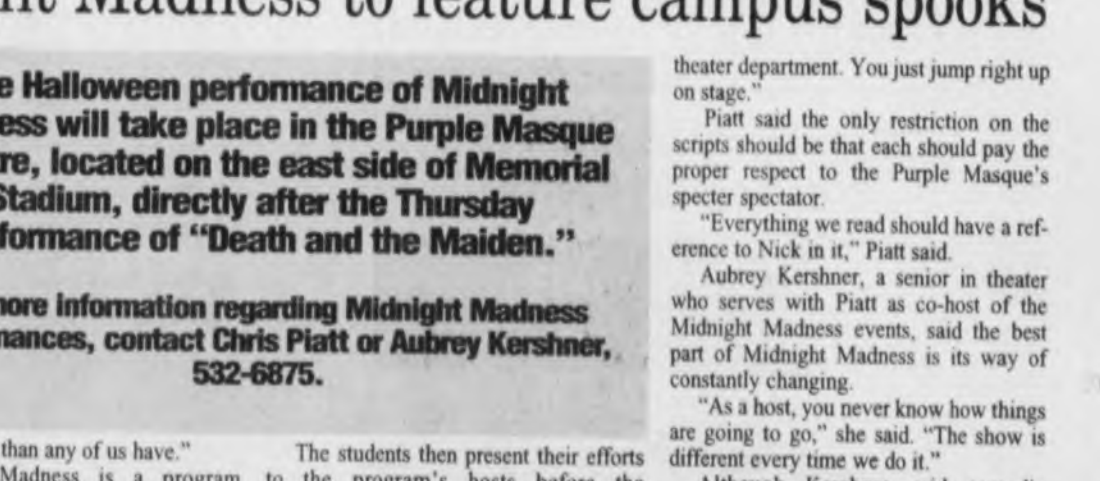
Piatt said the only restriction on the scripts should be that each should pay the proper respect to the Purple Masque's specter spectator.

"Everything we read should have a reference to Nick in it," Piatt said.



Aubrey Kershner, a senior in theater who serves with Piatt as co-host of the Midnight Madness events, said the best part of Midnight Madness is its way of constantly changing.

"As a host, you never know how things are going to go," she said. "The show is different every time we do it."



Although Kershner said comedic scripts usually are the most popular with Midnight Madness audiences, both she and Piatt said students wanting to turn in scripts are allowed free range on their works.

"You can write anything. Don't limit yourself," Piatt said. "Don't try to fall within certain parameters."

Lawyers prepare case in trial involving beating death of gay man in Wyoming

■ Defense will try to keep man who admitted taking part in killing off death row.

BY ROBERT W. BLACK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LARAMIE, Wyo. — No one disputes that Aaron McKinney helped pistol-whip Matthew Shepard and then left him lashed to a fence on a freezing Wyoming prairie.

His lawyers already have said during jury selection that McKinney played a role in the fatal beating of the gay college student last October.

With opening statements to begin Monday in McKinney's murder trial, those lawyers will try to keep him off death row by convincing jurors he never intended or planned to kill Shepard.

The killing drew enormous attention and became an emblem for many gay rights advocates of the need to add sexual orientation to anti-discrimination laws.

Defense lawyer Dion Custis has said the death was not a hate crime. He told prospective jurors that drugs and alcohol spurred McKinney's actions, and his client's use of those substances would be a core part of his defense.

"What you have to decide in this case is basically a question of why," he said during jury selection.

The 22-year-old laborer is charged with first-degree murder, aggravated robbery and kidnapping in the Oct. 7, 1998, beating. McKinney faces the death penalty if convicted.

Prosecutors say McKinney and Russell Henderson, 22, met Shepard in a bar and convinced him to leave with them. They say the pair drove Shepard to a remote area east of Laramie, tied him to the fence, robbed him of $20 and beat him into a coma. Shepard, 21, died five days later.

Henderson pleaded guilty in April to felony murder and kidnapping and received two life sentences.

Defense attorneys and prosecutors have declined comment, citing a judge's gag order.

Custis has said in court proceedings that he will try to persuade the jury to convict his client of the lesser offense of second-degree murder or manslaughter, which do not carry a possible death sentence.

"I guess there's some fine line there where you could say, 'I don't hate gays. I didn't intend to harm a gay person.'"

— Andrew Cohen, Denver legal analyst

He also must try to prove Shepard's death did not result from a kidnapping or robbery, because Wyoming subscribes to the felony-murder rule. That law allows a defendant to be convicted of murder for a death that results from the commission of a felony, even if the death is unintentional.

In other words, even if McKinney avoids conviction on the individual first-degree murder charge, he still could face the death penalty if the jury finds Shepard died as a result of a robbery or kidnapping.

"There was no intent or premeditation to affect the death of Matthew Shepard and also this did not occur during perpetration of a robbery, also known as felony murder," Custis told prospective jurors two weeks ago.

Although Custis has said the case is not a hate crime, some analysts speculate the defense might argue that McKinney reacted angrily to an advance by Shepard, a so-called "gay panic" strategy.

The problem is for the defense to avoid the implication that the beating was a hate crime, said Andrew Cohen, a Denver legal analyst.

"I guess there's some fine line there where you could say, 'I don't hate gays. I didn't intend to harm a gay person. When the gay person touched me, I lost my senses and under the influence of drugs attacked a gay person,'" he said.

Although the gay panic strategy has been used successfully before, fewer juries are accepting it these days, said Jeffrey Montgomery of the National Coalition of Anti-Violence Programs.

"There was a time when it was a virtual guarantee to get an acquittal, but in recent years it's been much more difficult," he said. "Juries are not as influenced by it, but it's also because prosecutors are much more better prepared and able to counter it."

Cheyenne prosecutor Jon Forwood, who is not involved in the case, predicted Custis will keep the strategy in his pocket unless it's necessary.

"A lot depends on how the evidence evolves," he said. "What statements did McKinney make to law enforcement earlier? What statements did Henderson make? What statements did they make to their girlfriends that they related back to law enforcement?"

Rev. Jerry Falwell presents sermon of tolerance

BY KIA SHANT'E BREAUX
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LYNCHBURG, Va. — The Rev. Jerry Falwell, the Moral Majority founder long known for his strong condemnation of homosexuality, on Sunday brought a message of God's love to 200 gay Christians invited into his church.

Falwell's sermon was the culmination of a weekend forum designed to reduce violence against gays and Christians. It was led by Falwell and gay minister Mel White, an author from California who ghost-wrote Falwell's autobiography before revealing his homosexuality.

"His sermon was amazing," said David Chandler, 36, a gay man from San Francisco and one of the more than 4,000 worshippers. "He sent a message to parents to love their children no matter what. ... I admire and respect Falwell for taking that stand."

The unprecedented meeting surprised many because Falwell for years condemned homosexuality.

Earlier this month, gay activists hissed, booed and screamed as Falwell lectured via satellite to about 60 people in a San Francisco park, urging them to give up homosexuality. Falwell also was ridiculed earlier this year when his newspaper cited evidence that the creators of the "Teletubbies" show intended Tinky Winky to be a gay role model.

As he had all weekend, Falwell stressed he will not change his belief that homosexuality is a sin, but added: "That has nothing to do with the love factor involved. We are to be lovers of all men and women."

Falwell was careful not to offend his visitors during his sermon, preaching from Proverbs 13, which offers advice on successful living in the eyes of God.

He spoke on the importance of working hard, living with integrity and not focusing on material things.

Falwell also talked at length about the importance of parents loving their children unconditionally. He noted that he is often asked by reporters and gay rights activists what he would do if one of his sons were gay.

"I'd tell him, 'I love you just as much ... I'm going to pray for you and do everything I can to bring you out of this lifestyle,'" he said.

Dozens of angry anti-homosexual protesters demonstrated outside Falwell's Baptist church, holding explicit signs and screaming at gay supporters as they entered the church.

Among those protesting the gathering was the Rev. Fred Phelps of Topeka, whose congregation also taunted gays at the funeral of Matthew Shepard, a gay college student who was killed in Wyoming.

"For him to invite these fags here and into his church is an abomination," Phelps said outside the church Sunday. "Now, Jerry Falwell is just as much a sinner as Mel White and both will burn in hell."

Falwell, 66, began the service by introducing and welcoming White and his guests and briefing his congregation on details of the anti-violence forum.

At Saturday's meeting, both sides apologized for harsh words said over the years and discussed ways to reduce violence against homosexuals.

White and Falwell agreed ahead of time to disagree on whether gays can be Christians and focus on ways to deter violence against homosexuals and Christians.

Falwell noted the September shootings at a Texas church and recent school shootings in which Christians were targeted, while White discussed the killings of gays such as Shepard.

White brought 200 gays and lesbians from 30 states to participate in the weekend's activities. They were joined by 200 evangelical Christians who support Falwell's stance.

Sunday's church service ended with the entire congregation standing together and singing the Baptist hymn "Only Trust Him." Falwell interrupted the song to reiterate to worshippers that what he or anyone else thought of them did not matter, but what was important is their relationship with God.

annual Crazy Cat Kickoff in front of Haymaker Hall. Dave Woodruff, junior in elementary education and KSUARH president, said the kickoff is a chance for residence hall members to do something distinctive.

"It is really a good event," Woodruff said. "The Crazy Cat Kickoff has an obstacle course, and it is wild and fun."

The kickoff also has a spin-around-the-bat competition as well as a contest to see how many marshmallows people can put in their mouths and still be able to talk.

Shane Holt, sophomore in agriculture communications and social chairman for KSUARH, said the kickoff is a chance for residence hall members to take part in Homecoming activities. The competitions are not just for athletes, and he said he expects about 200 people at the event.

On Tuesday, students have the opportunity to test their skills in the punt, pass and kick contest at Memorial Stadium, Haney said.

"The punt, pass and kick contest is a friendly competition, and we have prizes for the winners," Haney said.

Haney said it will be a good chance for students to participate in Homecoming activities, and he said pizza and soda will be available.

On Wednesday, Pant the Chant takes place, which is a contest between groups for the loudest and most creative chants. The contest will have a new flavor this year because contestants are encouraged to incorporate dance and movement into the chants. It will be at Ahearn Field House, and organizers said they are hoping the event will create excitement similar to the bodybuilding competition, which now is discontinued.

"Once we found out that body building was going to be canceled, we decided to move Pant the Chant inside to Ahearn," Haney said. "We are also encouraging the use of props, and it will be interesting to see what the different groups come up with."

Residence hall members participating in Pant the Chant said they were excited about the competition.

"We might have a smaller number of people at the competition than the greeks, but we should have an equal amount of energy and excitement," Holt said.

Mary Schwartz, junior in biology and pre-medicine, said the Pant the Chant competition will create a good feeling of spirit for those in attendance.

The K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics also will award a free tailgate party to the best exhibit. Haney said creativity is a big part of the week.

Friday is Purple Pride Day, and everyone on campus is expected to wear purple. The Homecoming parade will start at 4:30 p.m. and lead to a bonfire pep rally at Memorial Stadium.

Holt said the residence halls look forward to the event, and it takes a long time to get ready.

"The floats this year we wanted to be more constructed and put-together," Holt said. "It is something that those involved with take great pride in."

Schwartz said this year the floats will be driven into Memorial Stadium to be displayed during the evening's activities.

The floats will be on display in Aggieville on Saturday. During halftime at the football game, student ambassadors will be announced, and it will be the end of a busy week of events for those involved.

Despite all of the work and long hours, organizers said Homecoming is always well worth it.

"Homecoming is a really a good way for people to get to know one another, and it is a good time," Briggemann said.

BODY BUILDING

The event will not be replaced by anything this year, but members of the Homecoming committee said they were looking at the possibility of adding an event for next year.

Mary Schwartz, junior in biology and pre-medicine and Panhellenic Council Homecoming coordinator, said the decision to cancel body building has been positive.

"I think it is a really positive change," Schwartz said. "I think it is an improvement for K-State because of the time constraints body building took up."

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said he was pleased with the committee's ability to make changes.

"After the cancellation of body building, they have responded with a whole new focus and an ability to reorganize Homecoming," Bosco said.

Organizers said they will continue to look for ways to improve Homecoming week. Next year, there might be an added competition.

This year, Homecoming falls around the same time as Fright Night, and the different living organizations were able to add the event into the Homecoming competition.

Jeff Elliott, junior in accounting and Homecoming chairman for Kappa Sigma fraternity, said the absence of body building was different for each individual.

"Some people really miss body building, but then other people don't miss it at all," Elliott said.

Organizers said they expect spirit levels to remain high during Homecoming week from its start, with the hanging of banners, to the end, marked by the announcement of student ambassadors at halftime of the K-State vs. Baylor game.

"I think that as the week goes on, it will be a really successful week," Schwartz said.

ference. Young people are our ambassadors."

The program included students from preschool to college who developed a concern for the environment and animals.

It helped students gain an understanding about the animals, different cultures and the need for their involvement and learning.

Goodall told stories not only of human compassion but of chimpanzee compassion and how they care for their friends and families. One chimpanzee adopted a younger one when its mother died. Another chimpanzee saved its sibling from a venomous snake.

"We can help them in their time of need, too," she said.

At the ChimpanZoo exhibit, the students learned to observe the behavior of chimpanzees in six basic codes: food, movement, exploring, grooming, relaxing and mother/infant relationships. They studied wheat samples at the Human Nutrition Interest group as leaders of the group dressed in different styles of dress from different cultures.

"It's pretty neat," said Josh Goff, a fifth grader at Riley County Elementary.

Goodall established Roots and Shoots in 1991 in Tanzania, East Africa. It has grown to more than 1,000 clubs in 50 different countries throughout the world and has grown rapidly in the last few months, encouraging students to take an active stance in protecting the environment.

"We're teaching them to take the decisions into their own hands," Goodall said. "We can't leave the decisions to the decision-makers in politics."

Bradley said because the lecture is the first in what is hoped to be many, Huck Boyd Center staff members have been working hard in preparation for the lecture.

"I am glad that it is looking to be a success," Bradley said. "There has been quite a buildup due to the fact that we have been preparing since the beginning of the semester."

Bradley said he is looking forward to hearing what Dole has to say about his relationship with Boyd, former publisher of The Phillips County Review.

Freeland said she has anticipated this speech for a while and hopes that the public will respond well.

"I think this lecture will be successful, and I hope that from here we can expect to have more Huck Boyd lectures," Freeland said.

Columbine feels aftershocks months after shooting attack

By STEVEN K. PAULSON
The Associated Press

DENVER — A security videotape of the first moments of the Columbine massacre is broadcast nationwide. A student is arrested for making fresh threats. A surviving student's mother commits suicide.

Six months after a dozen students and a teacher were killed in the shooting attack, aftershocks continue to assail the Columbine community, and many wonder if it will ever end.

The latest emotional assault occurred Friday when the mother of one of the most gravely injured students walked into an Englewood pawn shop, asked to see a gun, loaded it when the clerk's back was turned and killed herself.

"We thought it was all over and it started all over again," said Angie Amaro, whose 15-year-old daughter, Crystal, attends Columbine. "This is another victim of Columbine."

A tragedy like the Columbine attack can cause feelings of helplessness and fresh waves of grief to take hold about six months later, psychologists say.

"This is just another layer of tragedy for the people of Columbine to have to deal with," said John Eachon, vice president of Access and Extended Services, whose counselors have worked with students in the wake of the attack.

Counselors are telling parents and students "they need to connect with friends, family and the faith community," Eachon said.

It was around lunchtime April 20 when students Eric Harris, 18, and Dylan Klebold, 17, scattered gunfire and bombs at the suburban high school, killing 13 and injuring about 26 before they committed suicide.

The worst school shooting in U.S. history drew together grief-stricken Littleton-area residents. They comforted each other and volunteered to help the victims' families. The students returned to classes in August after a stirring, rowdy "take back the school" rally.

In the passing months, however, the stark reality of the massacre has surfaced again and again.

Earlier this month, CBS-TV was criticized by some residents and Columbine families after it broadcast a brief segment of the security camera videotape that showed the opening moments of the attack.

A 17-year-old student was arrested last week for allegedly threatening to finish the job begun by the student gunmen.

And Friday, Carla June Hochhalter committed suicide.

It should have been a better time for the family.

Her daughter, 17-year-old Anne Marie, recently had moved her legs for the first time since the attack. The family was preparing to move into a new home that was equipped for Anne Marie Hochhalter's wheelchair.

Connie Michalik, whose son Richard Castaldo also was injured last spring, said she thought the family had finally turned a corner emotionally.

"We were all depressed and devastated ... she was no different from us," Michalik said. "I thought she was better, especially when Anne Marie moved her legs for the first time last week."

Michalik admitted she, too, has struggled with emotions because of her child's injuries. "There was I time where I thought I had nothing to live for. I know what she went through," she said.

Steve Cohn, whose 15-year-old son, Aaron, survived the library attack, said, "I just can't take it. That's my feeling. I can't believe someone killed themselves over those idiots. Her daughter pulled through a lot. It's been terrible for all of us."

Cohn and his son have been to counseling, but the sessions have been of little help to Aaron. "Until he opens up, there's nothing we can do," Steve Cohn said.

The stress is eroding his sense of safety, too.

"I drive by the school and I'm looking behind every tree. I feel like a cop. I want to prevent it before it happens again," he said.

Rec Complex adds rock-climing wall

By KELLY EVENSON
Kansas State Collegian

The Rock has arrived at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

This two-person simulated climbing wall is the newest addition in the Rec Complex's annual upgrading and replacement of equipment, Derek Walters, Rec Complex associate director, said.

Walters said the Rock, which opened Thursday, is a vertical treadmill built as a mechanical wall. When a person begins to climb, it will tilt forward or back as the program permits. Climbers can choose from 10 different programs that simulate various mountain faces, such as El Capitan and Devil's Tower, to get a workout.

"I didn't think it would be that great at first, but I was impressed once I got on and tried."

— A.J. Lovett, junior in finance

"This is more of a fitness equipment than a regular climbing wall," Walters said. "Straight, static walls just allow the person to go up and down, but this one keeps going around giving the person more of an overall workout."

Walters said another advantage to the Rock is that no training is required to use the equipment. He said many schools have installed a vertical wall, but a training session is required prior to use.

With this equipment, no trained staff is needed and anyone who wants to use it can benefit from the workout it provides.

"People think this is a good piece of equipment," Walters said. "A lot of people will use it, and it will serve as a supplement to most people's average workouts."

Walters said facilities that have straight walls get use from the general public for a while, but after about one year, only climbing organizations typically are using the equipment. He said he has found that with a rotating wall, people get more use out of it.

Chirag Patel, junior in finance and Rec Complex employee, said he was pleased with the workout the Rock offers.

"I like the different levels you can choose from, such as cardio or strength workouts," Patel said. "I am glad to see it's here because it gives the complex more unique features to offer to students."

Walters also said because the wall is only three to four feet from the ground, there is minimal danger when a person falls.

A.J. Lovitt, junior in finance and Rec Complex employee, said he has seen many people fall since it opened Thursday, but he said almost everybody gets right back on.

"Almost everyone falls the first time," Lovitt said. "More people right now would prefer to watch because they are scared of embarrassing themselves."

Walters said the wall has seen a steady crowd of people, and he said most like the workout they get. He said the equipment is good not only for the experienced mountain climber but also for beginners who might want to try something different.

"Climbers who will use it will find it challenging because they will get the resistance from going forward and back rather than only climbing up a static wall," Walters said. "The general participant will also like it because they can slow the program down and still get a quality, total body workout."

KAREN MIKOLS/Collegian

Joseph Cross, sophomore in civil engineering, looks for his next hold on the Rock, watched by Jarod Marcotte, sophomore in kinesiology, and Ben Hines, sophomore in international business.

Lovitt said he was glad the Rec Complex installed the wall because it gives the facility something new for students to try.

He also said he likes the workout he receives from the program because it works almost every part of the body.

"I didn't think it would be that great at first, but I was impressed once I got on and tried," Lovitt said. "The machine works about everything, so it is a great total workout."

Golfer among 5 dead in plane crash

By GLEN JOHNSON
The Associated Press

A LearJet carrying golf champion Payne Stewart and four other people flew uncontrolled over the nation's heartland for hours Monday before crashing in South Dakota, killing everyone aboard.

The twin-engine plane, which took off from Orlando, Fla., might have suffered a pressurization failure during its scheduled flight to Dallas, government officials said.

Stewart, who lived in Orlando, had been expected in Houston today for practice rounds in advance of the Tour Championship, the PGA Tour's final tournament of the year for the top 30 players on its money list. Stewart, known for his trademark knickers and tam-o'-shanter hat, went to Southern Methodist University in Dallas and still had friends in the area.

"It is difficult to express our sense of shock and sadness over the death of Payne Stewart," PGA Tour Commissioner Tim Finchem said in a statement from PGA headquarters in Ponte Vedra Beach, Fla.

"This is a tremendous loss for the entire golfing community and all of sports. He will always be remembered as a very special competitor and one who contributed enormously to the positive image of professional golf."

Stewart agents Robert Fraley and Van Ardan and the two pilots also were killed, said Bill Curry, a spokesman for Stewart's family. Fraley was CEO of Leader Enterprises Inc. and Ardan was president of the sports management company.

■ PAYNE DEATH
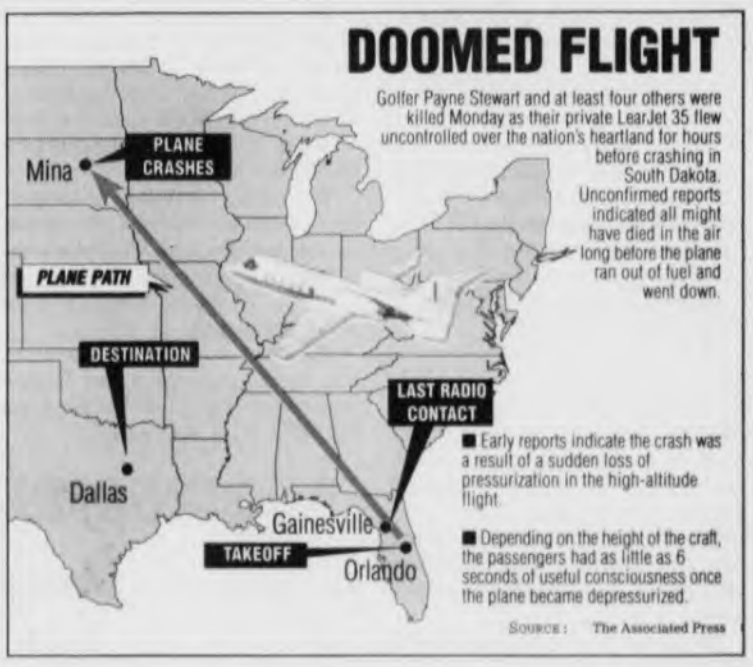
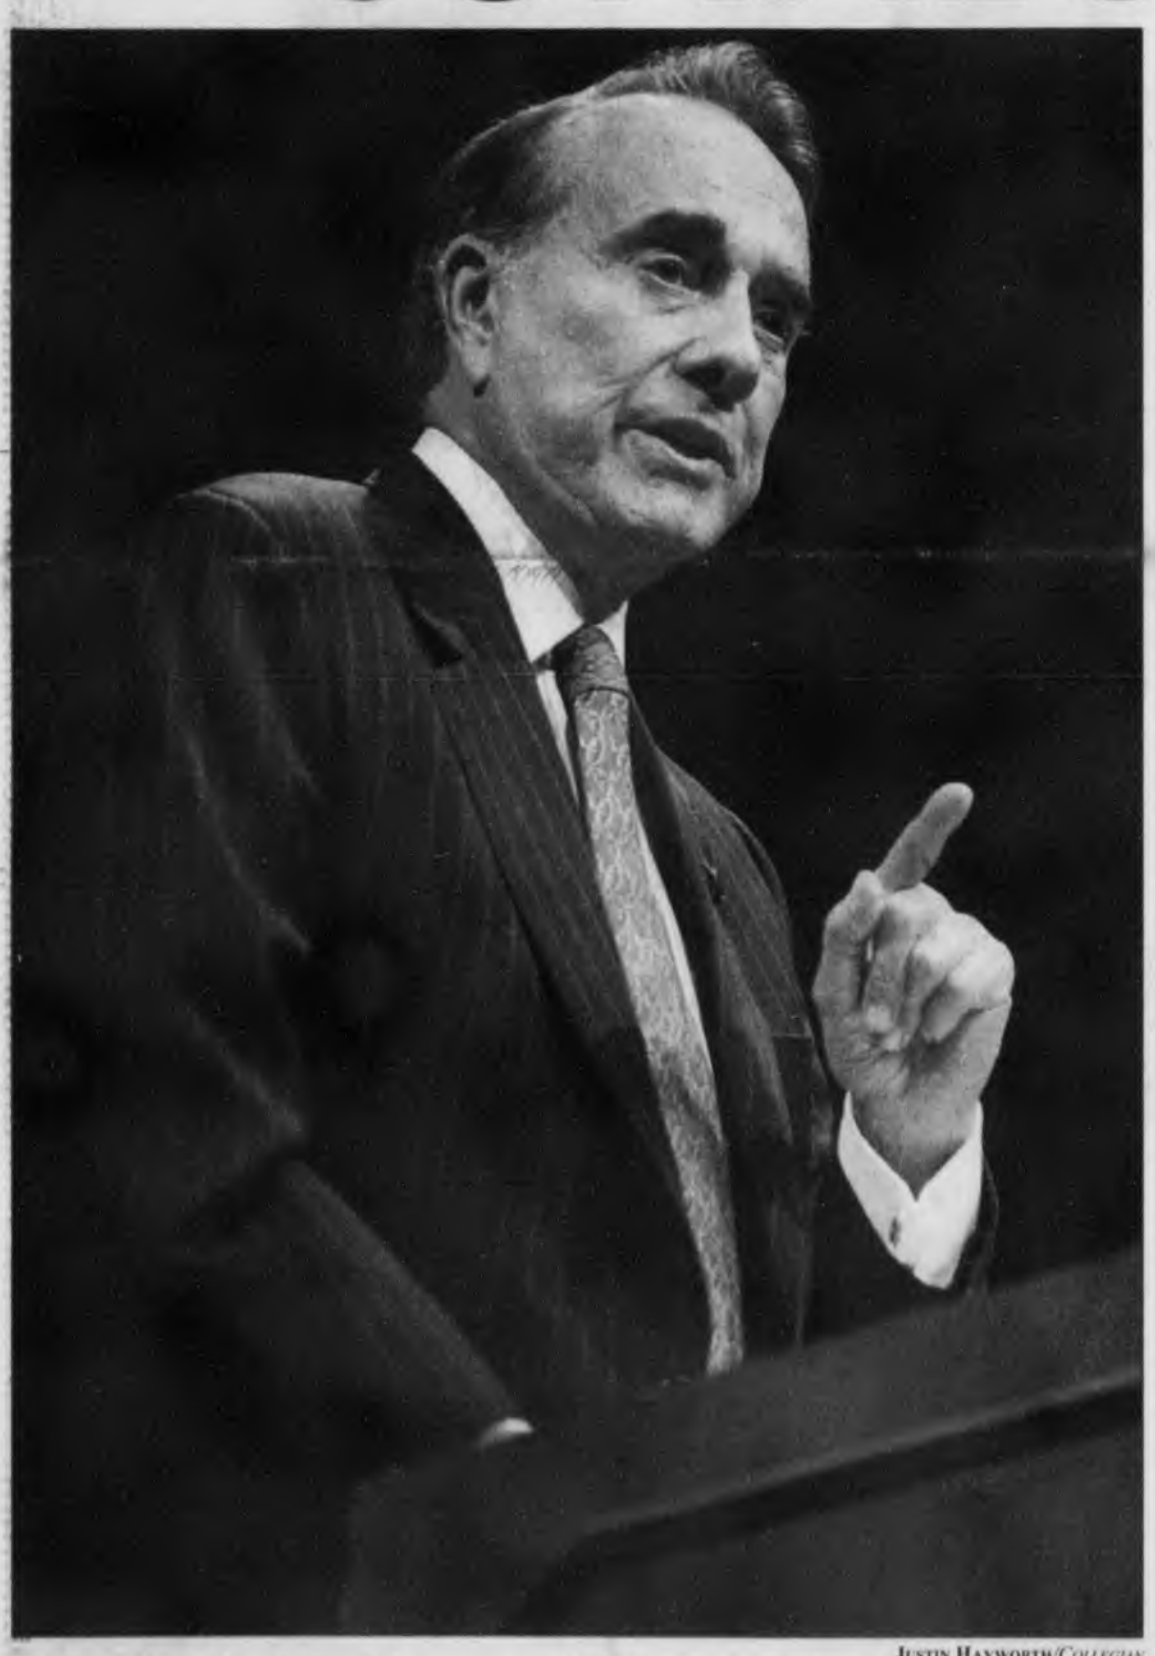
See page 6 for more information on the life and death of golf professional Payne Stewart.



The plane, a Lear 35 built in 1976, took off from Orlando at about 8:20 a.m. CDT, and the last communication came was it was over Gainesville, Fla., said Tony Molinaro, a Federal Aviation Administration spokesman in Chicago.

The jet had flown as high as 45,000 feet, and the crew did not respond to repeated inquiries from air traffic controllers, said Paul Turk, an FAA spokesman.

An Air Force fighter jet from Tyndall, Fla., was diverted from a routine training flight to check out the jet, Air Force officials said. Two fighters from Eglin Air Force Base, Fla., then took over to follow it and they later handed off the monitoring to two Air National Guard F-16s from Tulsa, Okla.



About four hours after takeoff, the plane crashed in a grassy field two miles west of Mina, S.D., in the north-central part of the state, said Gene Abdallah, Former Sen. Bob Dole delivers a speech Monday afternoon in McCain Auditorium on the importance of community newspapers. Dole was speaking in the inaugural Huck Boyd Lecture in Community Journalism.

Former U.S. Sen. Bob Dole says community media key to education, connectivity

STORIES BY SARAH BAHARI

The United States depends on strong community journalism to keep its people well-educated and connected to each other, Bob Dole said Monday during his speech, "Grassroots Journalism, Grassroots Democracy."

"When you lose your community newspaper, you can lose your entire town," he said.

Dole said 150 million people nationwide continue to read community newspapers.

Dole, former Senate majority leader and Republican presidential contender in the 1996 election, gave the inaugural Huck Boyd Lecture on Monday in McCain Auditorium.

Marie Boyd, widow of Huck Boyd, introduced Dole to the filled auditorium.

"There is no one else who can give special meaning to this day as Bob Dole," she said.

Huck Boyd, businessman and journalist, influenced Dole in his decision to enter politics.

Marie Boyd said she met Dole in 1960 at the start of his political career.

"He was the most candid and honest young man I had ever met," she said. "And today, my opinion has not changed."

Dole began his speech by saying how much he respected Huck Boyd.

"Huck was my mentor," he said. "We got along famously. Huck was way ahead of his time."

Dole said he is optimistic about the future of the country.

"There's a lot to look forward to in America because of technology and education," he said, "and because of great schools like Kansas State University and because of community newspapers."

Dole said that when he was asked to speak at the commencement at George Washington University, he agreed, as long as he could meet with the students prior to the ceremony, so he could give his speech more meaning than the average commencement speech.

"Commencement speakers are a lot like corpses," he said. "You can't hold the event without one, but you don't expect them to say much."

Dole said the students told him they would like him to focus on sacrifice, public service and the fact that finishing first is not always the most important factor.

"These students understood that somebody made a sacrifice for them, or they wouldn't be in that graduating class," he said.

Dole said taking responsibility for one's actions is the most important characteristic of a great leader.

Pat Buchanan abandons GOP, joins 3rd party

By RON FOURNIER
The Associated Press

FALLS CHURCH, Va. — Republican presidential candidate Pat Buchanan bolted the GOP on Monday to begin a third-party campaign and "rescue God's country" from a cultural and moral pit.

"Only the Reform Party offers the hope of a real debate and a true choice," he said.

"Our vaunted two-party system is a snare and a delusion, a fraud upon the nation," said Buchanan, a thrice-failed GOP candidate whose anti-abortion conservatism and anti-trade populism could siphon votes from the Republican and Democratic nominees.

He first must win the Reform Party nomination, no small task if billionaire Donald Trump — who joined the party's New York affiliate Monday — Minnesota Gov. Jesse Ventura or party founder Ross Perot jump in the race. Buchanan is a longshot for the presidency; National polls suggest no more than one in 10 voters support him.

Starting down what he called our patriot's road, the pugnacious conservative had harsh words for President Clinton, presidential front-runner George W. Bush, the Supreme Court, the Education Department, leaders of both main parties, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and "the godless New World Order."

"Let me say to the money boys and the Beltway elites who think that, at long last, they have pulled up their drawbridge and locked us out forever: You don't know this peasant army," Buchanan said. "We have not yet begun to fight."

"Go Pat, go," more than 300 supporters called from the ranks of the Republican and Reform parties, gathered at a suburban Washington hotel.

His sound system repeatedly failing him, the former Nixon White House aide joked, "Who put G. Gordon Liddy in charge of the microphones?"

Buchanan is the sixth nominee to quit the GOP nomination race, leaving Bush and five others. A compacted primary schedule and the Texas governor's record-shattering fund-raising winnowed the field earlier than usual.

Buchanan criticized Bush's education plans and delivered a veiled slap at the GOP front-runner by saying both parties seek out the hollow men, the malleable men as candidates.

In a statement released by his campaign, Bush said, "Pat Buchanan is leaving the Republican Party because Republicans rejected his views during his three failed attempts to earn the Republican Party's presidential nomination."

The remarks were more pointed than usual from Bush. He had measured his words in recent weeks as others denounced Buchanan's views about Nazi Germany.

Presidential rival John McCain of Arizona, who had suggested that Bush was appeasing Buchanan, issued a

Dole discusses political future of wife, self in upcoming elections

Bob Dole, former Senate majority leader and Republican presidential contender, answered questions regarding the upcoming presidential election and his plans Monday afternoon after his lecture.

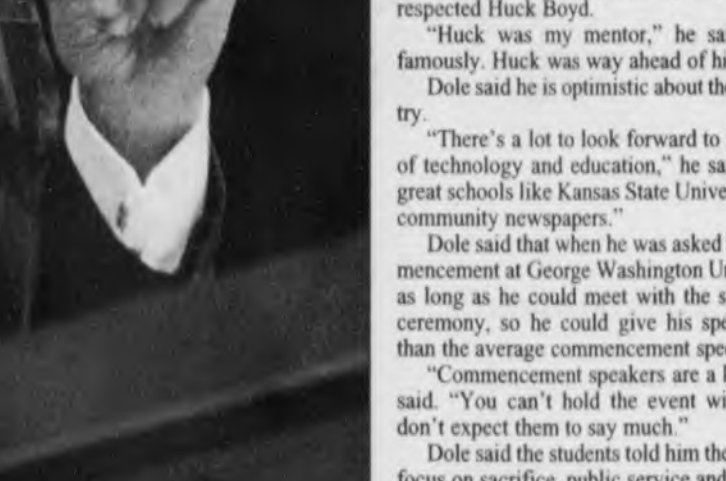
Dole said it is premature to speculate as to whether his wife Elizabeth Dole will be on the presidential ticket as a running mate for a Republican candidate.

"My view is she is a big asset for the Republican party," he said. "The Republican party has lost a lot of women.

"Whether or not she comes out will depend on who the candidate is," he said.

In his speech, Dole joked he previously had planned to talk about his goals as the first first man.

He said there is a bias in the media against women in politics.



"Most of the stories about her talked about whether or not she wore a matching suit and what color her nails were," he said. "They never said that kind of stuff about me when I was running."

Dole commented on other presidential primary candidates for the 2000 election.

He said he has not yet picked which candidate to support now that his wife has dropped out of the election due to a lack of funds.

Gov. George W. Bush and Sen. John McCain are the two main contenders for the Republican nomination. Bill Bradley

Sonia Gandhi defends slain husband, ex-prime minister

NEW DELHI, India — Opposition leader Sonia Gandhi accused the government Monday of slandering her slain husband after prosecutors said he was involved in trying to cover up a 1986 kickback.

The dispute threatened to disrupt the current session of parliament, during which the government had hoped to push through long-pending economic legislation.

Legislators said Sonia Gandhi's opposition Congress party might withdraw its promise to cooperate with the speedy passage of government-sponsored bills if the allegations against her husband stand.

The scandal about a $1.4 billion weapons purchase was revived Friday when corruption and conspiracy charges were filed in court against two foreign businessmen and two Indians, as well as Swedish arms maker AB Bofors.

Federal police said Rajiv Gandhi, who was prime minister and defense minister at the time of the deal, tried to block the investigation into alleged bribery in the purchase of artillery guns from the Swedish firm.

"There is nothing substantial. My husband is innocent," Sonia Gandhi told reporters. She said Rajiv Gandhi's name should have been omitted from the charges since he cannot defend himself. Gandhi was assassinated in 1991 by a suicide bomber.

Experts predict AIDS threat could erase Asian progress

KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia — The AIDS epidemic in Asia could erase the region's economic gains over the past two decades unless governments maintain funding for social programs, a World Bank expert warned Monday.

In Indonesia, Thailand, Cambodia, Myanmar, Malaysia, Vietnam and southern China, AIDS had gained a strong foothold, even before the economic crisis struck in 1997, said Martha Ainsworth, a senior World Bank economist.

The dreaded virus threatens to slowly unravel the progress in improving the human condition and to eliminate if not reverse the benefits of the economic miracle, Ainsworth told the 5th International Congress on AIDS in Asia and the Pacific, which took place in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia.

The region's two-year economic crisis may have further hurt Asia's fight against AIDS, Ainsworth said. Hundreds of companies went bankrupt and cash-strapped governments were forced to slash budgets. The economic turmoil pushed thousands of families into poverty and many women into prostitution.

"Even before the crisis, political commitment to AIDS prevention in the region was weak," Ainsworth said. "Many policy makers are still in denial."

Before the economic downturn, governments channeled funds into education and health care budgets, resulting in higher life expectancies and reduced poverty.

"The full impact of the crisis on HIV depends critically on how well governments and households succeeded in maintaining social safety nets," said Ainsworth, an expert on the effect of AIDS on households.

Israel destroys Palestinian home in eastern Jerusalem

JERUSALEM — Israel tore down the home of three Palestinian families in east Jerusalem on Monday despite a promise to slow the pace of such demolitions.

Israel's police minister, Shlomo Ben-Ami, opposes demolishing Palestinian homes built without permits and has been reexamining the practice. Since moderate Prime Minister Ehud Barak took office July 6, only four homes have been razed.

The owner of the house destroyed Monday, Fouwad Khader, said he had been warned by police that his home would be demolished and obtained a court order in an effort to block the action.

Nonetheless, Israeli police knocked on Khader's door early Monday to tell him workers were on their way to destroy the house. Three Palestinian families totaling 20 people live in the house in the Beit Hanina neighborhood of east Jerusalem, Khader said.

Palestinians accuse Israel of trying to evict Palestinian residents from east Jerusalem by refusing to grant building permits and then revoking Israeli identification cards from those who do not live in the city.

Israel captured east Jerusalem in 1967 and later annexed it, proclaiming it part of the country's capital. The Palestinians hope to make east Jerusalem the capital of a future state.

21 companies form alliance to promote jobs for disabled

REDMOND, Wash. — Twenty-one U.S. companies, led by Microsoft Corp., have formed an alliance with the National Business and Disabilities Council to increase job opportunities for people with disabilities.

Microsoft chairman Bill Gates said Monday that the companies taking part in the Able To Work program will share their expertise to promote hiring of the disabled.

The program also has launched a Web site, Abletowork.org, to share information on available jobs and job applicants.

Gates said unemployment among working-age people with disabilities is higher than 70 percent, making them the most underutilized segment of America's workforce.

"Businesses in virtually every industry, the technology industry not excepted, are struggling today to find enough qualified applicants to fill open jobs," Gates said in a speech to the NBDC annual chief executive conference, held at Microsoft's headquarters.

Fake police officer arrested after pulling over real thing

NEW YORK — A man pretending to be a detective was arrested after he pulled over a motorist who turned out to be a police officer, authorities said.

Matthew Daly, 27, flicked on a flashing red police light in his white Nissan and pulled over a car at 34th Street and Madison Avenue in Manhattan about 2:45 p.m. Sunday, police said.

Daly — wearing a bulletproof vest and flaunting a fake detective's shield and replica gun — then allegedly walked up to the car of Officer Anthony Ferrone and told him he had run a red light.

As soon as Ferrone said he was a police officer, Daly ran back to his car and sped off. But Ferrone soon chased him down, police said.

Daly was being retained today on charges of impersonating a police officer and criminal possession of a weapon and a bulletproof vest.

Union customer counts, sales decrease

BY LAUREN BEATTY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Sales at the K-State Student Union in July through September 1999 decreased nearly $300,000 from July through September 1998.

The temporary relocation of the K-State Student Union Bookstore and the Information Counter have hurt Union revenues, said Bernard Pitts, executive director of the Union, at the Union Governing Board meeting Monday night.

"We anticipated that, but not to this degree," Pitts said.

The bookstore is being renovated to add 5,000 square feet to the lower level location. The bookstore is temporarily located on the second floor. An auxiliary store has opened in Seaton Hall and another should soon be opening in Hale Library.

Pitts said in addition to the auxiliary stores, he hopes to speed the process of the renovations in order to retain some customers.

There are other revenue losses as well.

The success of Burger King and Taco Bell has affected sales at the other food establishments that once were the only brand-name food places in the Union.

"Subway and Sbarro are really going to have to market themselves to this campus," Pitts said.

UGB members said overall customer counts and profits are down for the entire Union. In addition to the $291,946 decrease in sales, customer counts dropped by 20,882 from a year ago.

Jack Thoman, assistant director of business affairs, said that was expected and the UGB planned on there being no profits earned this year due to the enhancement project.

However, Pitts said K-State President Jon Wefald has requested the concourse be recarpeted at a price tag of $120,000, something that is not in the budget.

Carl Boger, Faculty Senate representative, said the project could probably receive funding from the Student Senate Privilege Fee Committee, and should be brought to it, not UGB.

In other business, Pitts said the exclusivity deal with Coca-Cola or Pepsi Co. still is in progress. Pitts said not all the university's requirements are met in the two companies' final offers.

In milestone for peace, Israel opens land link between West Bank, Gaza Strip

BY DANA BUDEIRI
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

EREZ CROSSING, Gaza Strip — Hundreds of eager Palestinians shouldering duffel bags and suitcases traveled 28 miles across Israel on Monday — inaugurating a safe passage that for the first time links the areas under their control and takes them a step closer to statehood.

For some, the passage by bus or taxi between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank was their first glimpse inside the country they had struggled against for years.

From the window of his taxi, Sami Ahmed, a 19-year-old who had never before left Gaza, intently observed the Israeli landscapes flying by; communal farms, pine forests and the occasional military jeep guarding the route.

"What are those?" he asked, pointing to some ruins.

Fellow passenger Saber Abu Lehieh, 70, who knew the area from the time before Israel's creation in 1948, said they were the remains of Beit Jibrin, an Arab village destroyed in the 1948 Mideast war.

The safe passage between the Erez Crossing in Gaza to Tarkumiya in the West Bank takes the Palestinians a step closer to statehood by linking the two autonomous areas on either side of Israel that they hope will eventually make up their state. The opening helped boost Palestinian support for peacemaking and also enabled residents of crowded Gaza to seek jobs in the more prosperous West Bank.

In all, some 132,000 Palestinians so far are eligible to use the route — 130,000 workers and business people who have had permission to enter Israel in the past, and 2,000 who were granted special passage permits in recent days. In the past, those with permits could go to Israel, but not to the other Palestinian territory.

More safe passage permits are to be issued in coming days. Israeli officials said they expected about 1,000 daily travelers on the route, which is open from 7 a.m. to 5 p.m.

"Careful with those travel permits, they are your tickets to freedom," taxi driver Ali Mohammed said to his six passengers.

Arabic music blasting from his taxi radio, Mohammed was busy making calls on his mobile phone to tell friends the safe passage was open.

Abu Lehieh said he hadn't left Gaza since the 1993 signing of the first Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement.

In the past six years, Israel imposed more and more restrictions on Palestinian travel, including blanket security closures, to prevent Islamic militants from carrying out attacks.

"The peace agreement was signed, and the doors of Erez (crossing) swung shut," Abu Lehieh said.

However, on Monday, he was upbeat.

"Step by step, we are getting closer to peace," he said.

The taxi completed the trip in about half an hour. Israel allows up to two hours for the trip, and travelers are clocked upon departure and arrival.

Those who are late can expect to be questioned by Israeli security forces.

On Monday the mood was pleasant, with Israeli officers shaking hands with some travelers.

Shadi Abu Arab, 20, an unemployed Gaza resident who arrived in the West Bank by bus, said he was headed to the town of Tulkarem to look for a job.

"All the doors were closed to me in Gaza, and I couldn't wait until this door, the safe passage, opened up," Abu Arab said.

The safe passage was first negotiated as part of 1995 interim peace accord. However, Israel repeatedly delayed the opening, citing fears that Palestinian militants would use the route to enter Israel and carry out terror attacks.

Under the latest interim peace deal, the safe passage was to open Oct. 1, but disagreements over how to operate the route held up the opening until Monday.

Palestinians considered to be security risks can travel the route twice a week on special buses manned by Israeli security personnel.

By the end of the year, a second route is to open between the northern West Bank and Gaza, but the details have not been worked out.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak has said that in a final peace deal, he hopes to build an elevated highway so Palestinians can travel between the two areas without entering Israel.

Such a highway would give the Palestinians the territorial contiguity necessary to join Gaza and the West Bank in a unified state.

In March of 1996, the U.S. Presidential candidate Pat Buchanan said on national television that he wasn't descended from apes, and he didn't think children should be taught that they are. Not a single U.S. journalist questioned him on this position. In 1999, the Kansas School Board removed evolution and discussions of the Big Band from its curriculum, in spite of the fact that these are not controversial scientific issues, and moreover, the alternatives disagree with observation. Lawrence Krauss will explore examples from the news, advertisements, TV shows and movies, as well as from his latest book, to discuss the difference between science and fiction and to explore how the distinction between sense and nonsense is becoming blurred in popular discourse.

The lecture will be part "tour" through the fascinating world of modern physics, part fun-filled examination of video clips, and part sober discussion of the various dangers facing modern society if we fail to learn the lessons science has taught us about the world. We must not be timid about offending sensibilities when those sensibilities are based on nonsense.

Homecoming Week should be inclusive

The sweaty smell of matching sweatshirts worn several days in a row and the hung over students wearing them on campus can mean only one thing: it's Homecoming Week.

At least, it's Homecoming Week for about one-third of the K-State population. For that sect, also known as the greeks, this week signals one giant excuse to party, with the added bonus of never having to decide what to wear.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion

For the rest of the population, it's just another week, and therein lies the problem. Homecoming should be a time for K-Staters — all alumni, students and friends of the university — to take pride in both the academics and athletics at K-State. Unfortunately, that is exactly what it isn't.

As it stands, Homecoming is a week of exclusive events with token attempts to make everyone on campus feel included. Independents should take more initiative to get involved; however, that is difficult to do knowing they probably will be laughed at by greeks for their efforts. So, for the most part, independents don't celebrate K-State during Homecoming.

Even the third of campus that does celebrate the week rarely uses it to express pride in the university. If they did, the matching sweatshirts we see on campus would be in school colors instead of blue and green.

Ideally, Homecoming Week would encompass the entire campus and promote a sense of community. That simply doesn't happen with the current system. The way things stand now, Homecoming is divisive. Greek houses compete first for homecoming pairings, and then those pairings compete against one another — sometimes nastily. That doesn't seem like the best way to build community spirit.

With a better system, the K-State Student Union Book Store would design a homecoming shirt for the entire campus and alumni in school colors. Pep rallies and other homecoming activities would include everyone in trying to build spirit for the upcoming game.

It's too late this year, but maybe next year.

Senator pulls out race card to divert attention from real issues

DANEDRI THOMPSON

Shame on Sen. Minority Leader, Tom Daschle, D-SD, for accusing Republicans of expressing an "array of anti-minority sentiments" last week. As one former Simpson trial lawyer would say, he dealt the race card from the bottom of the deck.

Daschle made the accusation after members of the Foreign Relations Committee hinted former Sen. Carol Moseley-Braun, D-Ill., a black woman, might have trouble getting approved as ambassador to New Zealand. Daschle mentioned it generally takes twice as long for minority judicial nominees to be approved as further evidence that the Republicans are racist.

It's ironic that one of the longest minority judicial appointments was slowed by the Democrats. When former President George Bush nominated Clarence Thomas to sit on the U.S. Supreme Court, Democrats went out of their way to slow the process. That lengthy nomination figures into Daschle's statistics, but Daschle has the audacity to blame Republicans for all holdups.

Apparently, Daschle and the rest of the Congressional Democrats think because Moseley-Braun happens to be a minority, no one should question her nomination. It's a ridiculous notion.

Daschle obviously knows the quickest way to divert attention from the real issues is to call someone a racist. He uses the name-calling tactic specifically with that purpose in mind knowing if people knew the real issues, Moseley-Braun never would be approved for an ambassadorship.

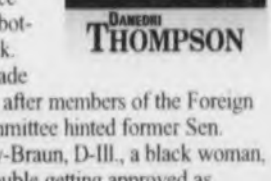
Moseley-Braun has had problems in the past that have nothing to do with being a minority. She was accused of mismanaging campaign funds during her failed attempt at re-election to the Senate. Part of those funds went to pay her former fiance and campaign manager, Kgosie Matthews, $15,000 each week for his efforts.

Her relationship with Matthews played a part in another Moseley-Braun faux pas. In 1996, then-Sen. Moseley-Braun vacationed in Nigeria with Matthews, who was on the Nigerian payroll as a hired agent for the Nigerian government. His boss was dictator, Gen. Sani Abacha. On her vacation, Moseley-Braun and Matthews palled around with the dictator and his wife. That was a big mistake.

Abacha, prior to his death in 1998, was well-known throughout the world for his brutality. His rise to power in 1993 was a slap in the face to democracy. When he lost a 1993 election, he overthrew the election by putting the democratically-elected leader in prison for treason.

Throwing the opposition in prison seems to have been one of his favorite pastimes. When he died, 21 journalists sat rotting in Nigerian jail cells for their opposition of Abacha's military rule.

They were lucky Abacha didn't opt to hang them. None of Abacha's acts as dictator drew more fire from the international community than the 1995 hangings of environmentalist and playwright, Ken Saro-Wiwa and eight other activists. The group was convicted in a closed military tribunal for murdering political opponents. However, critics, including then-South African President Nelson Mandela, believed the charges to be false. Mandela even appealed for mercy. When it was denied, he called for international sanctions against Nigerian oil. Our country agreed and pressed for sanctions.



Moseley-Braun, however, stood on the opposing side of the sanction fence. During her short-lived Congressional career, she maintained that Nigeria's government merely was misunderstood, and the United States should try to be nicer.

To prove her stance, Moseley-Braun spent a good part of her Nigerian vacation gallivanting around the country with Abacha and his wife. That little vacation put her in direct conflict with this country's diplomatic policies — not exactly the best quality for an ambassador.

By all means, though, let's give Moseley-Braun an ambassadorship, lest we all be called racists.

President Clinton leads search for witch who stole American foreign policy

JONATHAN KURCHE

In October of 1999, three public servants disappeared in the woods near Burkittsville, Md., while filming a documentary.

A year later their footage was discovered.

President William Jefferson Michael Williams Clinton set out with Heather Donahu, a C-SPAN intern and audio specialist, and Joshua Leonardo, a C-SPAN cameraman, for the backwoods of Maryland. They were in search of the mysterious Blair Witch, an evil entity rumored to have stolen American foreign policy.

After an exhaustive search, local authorities found the officials' equipment along with some Burger King wrappers and a handwritten diary belonging to Clinton buried under the foundation of an ancient log cabin. Police said they would not speculate on the reason the modern film equipment and backpacks were found under the hundred-year old structure, but did say the footage discovered gave a rather detailed picture of the last few days of their lives.

This is their story, as told by Clinton's journal:

Oct. 20 — We are three, three are we. Three is a magic number. One is the number for leadership, for creativity, but we are three. A little worried about how this trip will go, about whether we will find the witch. The witch apparently has stolen foreign policy before. This will be the first time I am in charge of something, so I don't want to mess it up.

Set out early this morning in search of foreign policy. We all met at Heather's house; since 1600 Pennsylvania Ave. already was full of voters from New York. Her mom offered to make us breakfast, and I obliged since she was cute in an older kind of way. Her daughter isn't bad, either. Should be interesting spending a few days in the woods with Heather, if only the camera guy wasn't around.

No! Must be strong! Must keep the integrity of the group! Still ...

Made it to Burkittsville about mid-morning to begin investigating. Spoke to a woman carrying a child who kept picking his nose. I meant to listen to what the woman said, in case it was important, but missed it because my mind was on the child and how funny it was that he was picking his nose.

The woman said something about our United Nations dues and how we might lose voting privileges next year if we don't pay them, and the kid kept screeching every time she said "U.N." I became annoyed at how much the conversation resembled a discussion I had with John McCain.

Decided to go get Burger King before interviewing weird Mary woman who lives in the woods.

I ordered a Whopper. Cheese was no good. Should have known better than to order Burger King in sticksville.

Interviewed weird Mary woman. She said the Blair Witch told her only 21 of the 154 countries that signed the 1996 test-ban treaty have signed the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, and that the CIA might not be able to detect small nuclear tests.

Weird Mary said I must remember around 50 countries have ratified the treaty. I must remember if we can locate submarines with satellites by the way their metal mass bends the earth's magnetic field, we should be able to detect the EM pulse from any earthbound nuclear test. Need to find out what that means. Woman also said there is no way to enforce the CTBT, since once a country is able to make nuclear weapons, there is no way to force Pandora back in the box. Should use threat of sanctions.

Must hold things together. Unity is key. If the United States gives up any role it has in the world, there is no way to have influence over other countries. Give up involvement in U.N. and World Bank — DISASTER! Can no longer use them to force open markets and bully. Got wasted tonight. I may be losing Heather and Josh. Should try to lead more. Must be strong.

Oct. 21 — Visited coffin rock. Whoo, scary! The budget for foreign policy died there — 14 percent of it was cut! Wye accords were killed by the witch — cornerstone to Mideast peace. No debt relief to world's poorest countries, no pay for the Peace Corps. Blair Witch killed them all!

Apparently, Blair Witch said it wouldn't take from social security, even though its budget already demands fishing into social security accounts. The witch uses some kind of accounting voodoo to pay for budget items — like designating things as "emergency" spending items so they are not bound by congressional caps. The Blair Witch already has made Pentagon maintenance and census funding emergency expenditures. The Blair Witch is evil.

Into the woods! Scary! Found strange stones. Hope we don't get lost! I have a map from the Truman era to guide our foreign policy.

Truman Doctrine was good. Dewey, Republican, was good. Marshall plan was good, good foreign policy.

Trying to keep group together, Heather and Josh, Josh and Heather.

I'm not doing a good job of writing in this journal. Sorry. Sorry.

Oct. 22 — In woods. Josh kicked our map into the river after we discovered the Cold War was why Truman's foreign policy was bipartisan. Cold War is over. We have no map. I wanted to kill Josh, but he is right. I could use a cigarette. Must not lose hope. Must keep hope. Heather yelled at me today. I must be strong. Still, I feel like crying. I miss Buddy.

Oct. 23 — Heard noises! Noises in the night! Voices saying that domestic programs will fall in the budget cuts — community policing, meals for senior citizens, Head Start, and national institutes of health — all fallen! Afraid. I want to go home, but I can't find my way out of these woods. We keep running into the same rock piles. I smell, I'm hungry. Tried eating leaves today. Did not taste good — wish I had that Whopper now!

Yow! Sticks! In the trees! Mommee! I'm sorry, sorry sorry .

The journal ends there.

The rediscovered video footage from the last moments reveals little, other than the interior of the cabin and a prunelike old fellow bearing a resemblance to Jesse Helms.

Helms was not available for comment.

Investigations into the disappearance were cut short when the C-SPAN network demanded the return of its only camera. It apparently had been reported missing following a white house staff meeting Leonardo was covering a year earlier. C-SPAN had to resort this year to showing footage from the House of Lords.

Strangely, its ratings have improved steadily.

The case has been declared inactive and unsolved.

Oklahoma bartender thanks K-State fans for good deed

Editor,

I am writing to thank the K-State fans who visited Stillwater for Saturday's game. I am a bartender at Eskimo Joe's.

I came into work in a hurry Saturday morning and forgot to set the parking brake in my car (Haven't we all done that before?).

About a half an hour later, a friend came up and asked why I had taken two spaces in the parking lot.

When I looked out to window, I saw that my car apparently had rolled down the curb. Luckily, it didn't hit anything.

The K-State fans who were sitting out in the parking lot had pushed it back up the hill and placed bricks under the tires, saving me the embarrassment of trying to explain to the cops why my car was sitting in the middle of the street or worse, why it was sticking halfway out the side of Eskimo Joe's.

I could only imagine how bad it could have turned out.

So, thanks to whomever helped me out, and thanks to everyone for turning out to the game (Or should I say, one quarter of a game and three quarters of a K-State butt-kicking!). You all were great and I am looking forward to next year's game.

Thanks again,

Jason Glover

Manhattan haunted house moves to new location, plans live remotes

BY JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Freddy Krueger had an unnerving habit of appearing unannounced in people's dreams.

But a headstone engraved with the words "Nightmare on Main Street" gives advanced warning to Manhattan citizens.

This sign sits next to Krueger's head at the haunted house, located in the Manhattan Town Center courtyard, next to Pier One Imports.

Organized by the Manhattan-area Jaycees, a community service organization, the house will open again Wednesday and closes Halloween.

Andy Streeter, Jaycees president, said this is the first year the Jaycees have had the house at this location.

"We had to have it at a place that had a sprinkler system," Streeter said. "Before we had had it outside the city limits, but this year we needed to have it at different place."

Streeter said in the 21 years the haunted house has been done, it always has been successful in the Manhattan area.

"We sponsor the haunted house to make money for our area chapter and for extra support in the community," Streeter said. "So we try to make it a good house that attracts a lot of people."

Streeter said admission to the house costs $5 for an adult and $3 for children 10 and under.

In addition to the haunted house, KJCK-FM 94.5 will be running live remotes from the entrance.

"We wanted to promote the Jaycees and their house," Bradley J, KJCK-FM disc jockey, said. "I am going to be out here some nights doing a remote during Austin Michaels' show."

Streeter said preparing for the haunted house cost about $300 or $400.

"We have worked very hard on this house so that it can be a great success like it has been in the past," Streeter said. "We appreciate all the people that come down to support it so we really try to make it as original and creative as we can."

Kiane Mahaffey of Randolph, Kan., said she heard about the haunted house on KJCK-FM and asked her parents to take her.

"I have never been before," Mahaffey said.

"But I heard about it on the radio and wanted to go."

Streeter said the haunted house appeals to mostly college and high school students, so they have added some twists to their setup this year.

"Seventy-five percent of our business is high school and college students," Streeter said. "We made a few changes to keep people coming back."

The haunted house usually attracts around 1,500 to 2,000 people a year, and Streeter said they are expecting a great turnout this year as well.

Study finds horror films reinforce gender roles

BY TRACY DOILE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State researchers have found horror movies facilitate gender role stereotypes in college students and real fear in young children.

Professor of psychology, Richard Harris, along with a team of graduate students, has conducted studies during the past two years that researched the effects of watching horror movies while on dates or as a child.

"Practically everybody has a movie that has really scared them," Harris said. "It's not an unusual experience."

Jason Brandenburg, graduate student in social psychology and member of the research team, said a general psychology subject pool was used for the research. The pool consisted of about 450 K-State students who were asked to recall a horror movie experience from a film they watched on a date and as a child.

Brandenburg said he found the personal responses were gender-related.

Christy Scott, graduate student in social psychology, also said she found the responses mostly to be gender stereotypical.

"Going to movies is one of the timeless practices of college dating," Scott said. "With this particular genre of movies, it seemed to be okay to slip into stereotypical gender roles."

She said most of the women wanted to appear more frightened than they actually were, possibly as an excuse to grab onto and touch their date. Most of the men, she said, wanted to appear less scared than they actually were and assume a tough-guy stance.

"Dating is such a large part of college, and movies are such a large part of dating that this gives you the opportunity to better understand college students' memories of films and how it relates to their overall dating experience," she said.

Harris said the childhood accounts were detailed and striking. The average age of the memory was 11 years old, so as much as a decade had lapsed between the time of the study and the actual viewing of the horror movie.

"People are still remembering movies and how they felt very vividly a very long time afterward," he said. "They'd really been extremely scared by these movies."

Harris said there was a wide range of R-rated horror movies that were the source of legitimate fears.

Harris said the effects ranged from sleep disturbances to a fear of swimming to being bothered by hockey sticks.

The responses highlight the seriousness of children's fears. Adults might want to take children's fears more seriously, Harris said.

"To a child who's afraid of something, that fear is very real," he said.

The reported experiences were gathered by using an autobiographical memory method, or the memory of the events of a person's life.

"We thought it was a good complement to other methodologies," Harris said.

Brandenburg said he thought the research results were a good representation of how movies effect people.

"They won't solve any social crisis, but it shows how the entertainment industry can effect us," he said.

McConaughey arrested after dancing naked, playing bongo drums

BY MIKE CRISSEY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUSTIN, Texas — Actor Matthew McConaughey was arrested early Monday during a disturbance at his home in which police said he was dancing naked and playing the bongo drums.

McConaughey, 29, was arrested at around 3 a.m. and booked into the Travis County Jail on suspicion of possession of marijuana, possession of drug paraphernalia and resisting transportation, according to a police statement.

He was charged only with resisting transportation, a Class A misdemeanor.

Travis County Attorney Ken Oden said the drug-related charges were dismissed because they were not supported by the facts of the case.

McConaughey was released Monday afternoon on a $1,000 personal recognizance bond.

McConaughey, a 1993 graduate of the University of Texas, would not comment on the charges.

"I don't want to rent a place there, but it was a nice stay for a night," McConaughey said of his time in jail.

Joe Turner, McConaughey's lawyer, said the police illegally searched the actor's home and used excessive force.

Police said they were called to McConaughey's home in an upscale neighborhood in west Austin after receiving a complaint of loud music.

Police saw him through a window naked and playing drums and another man dancing and clapping.

The other suspect was handcuffed, but not detained.

A Class A misdemeanor carries a maximum sentence of a year in county jail and a $4,000 fine.

Fellow golfers recall Stewart after crash

■ Former competitors remember man who won 18 tournaments on tour.

BY DOUG FERGUSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Golf great Payne Stewart was known for his knickers and tam-o'-shanter cap, a nod to golfing's old traditions, but also for his indomitable spirit.

"He had a real reverence for the game," fellow pro Peter Jacobsen said after Stewart's plane crashed Monday in South Dakota, killing all five aboard.

"As a golfer, his record speaks for itself," he said. "He was loved by many people."

Stewart, 42, won his second U.S. Open in June and, this year, also played in his first Ryder Cup since 1993, helping the United States in a dramatic win last month over Europe. In all, he won 18 tournaments, including three majors.

He was on his way to Texas, where the Tour Championship is being played this week in Houston.

"It is difficult to express our sense of shock and sadness over the death of Payne Stewart," PGA Tour commissioner Tim Finchem said.

"It is shocking," Tiger Woods said. "It's a tragedy. I can't even comprehend the scope of it. None of us can right now. There is an enormous void and emptiness I feel right now."

His last tournament victory was his finest moment. In June, Stewart made a 15-foot par putt on the final hole at Pinehurst No. 2 in North Carolina to win the U.S. Open by one stroke over Phil Mickelson. It was the longest putt ever to decide a U.S. Open on the 72nd hole its 99-year history.

When the putt fell, he thrust his arm into the air and let out a roar.

"All I wanted to do was give myself a chance," Stewart said, choking back tears. "I never gave up. I got the job done."

It was Stewart's third major championship in a career that began in 1980 and put a stamp on what had been a revival late in his career. He missed the cut last week in the Disney Classic, but reflected on his career the day before the tournament began.

"There were times when ... I played very poorly and I wasn't hav

FRESH FACES

STORY BY KELLI ALLIS

K-State travels to Texas for final tournament of fall season; 2 players on Cats' squad step forward in practice, make trip

Last week's qualifying rounds for the K-State men's golf team allowed a couple of different faces to travel to Waco, Texas, for the Baylor Invitational, which wraps up this afternoon.

The familiar faces making the trip for the last tournament of the Wildcats' fall season are senior Mark Sears, junior Dan Demory and sophomore Scott McNeely. Sears has participated in all four tournaments this season.

Playing for the first time this year is freshman Daryn Soldan. Junior Matt Williams is participating in only his second of the year.

Coach Tim Norris said he isn't nervous about having some different people playing the golf tournament.

"A couple of guys stepped it up in practice this (past) week," Norris said. "This is Matt's second tournament this year and Daryn's first. I'm anxious and excited to see how these guys will do."

Norris said all of them should play well.

"It will be interesting to see Daryn play. There is a lot of confidence in him," Norris said. "Matt has been playing well. He is a good hard worker. Mark has been playing some good golf. Dan is ready to play, too."

The Wildcats went to Waco facing mostly Texas colleges such as Sam Houston, Stephen F. Austin and SW Texas State. Five Big 12 teams, including Iowa State, Baylor, Texas A&M and Missouri, also competed.

Norris said he hopes the team will play loosely for its last tournament.

"Go down there with no expectations and play loose," Norris said. "End the fall season on a positive note."

Demory has personal goals to play strongly in Waco and also team goals.

"Team-wise, we have struggled as of late," Demory said. "We need to put in some good numbers. Play well so that we have some confidence to carry over winter break."

Demory didn't have to qualify for this tournament because he qualified for the Missouri tournament but chose not to go so he could stay and work on academics.

"I had to stick around for academics," Demory said. "It's not like I was flunking. I just needed to stay above the line."

Instead of qualifying during practice time, Demory got to spend some extra time on his short game.

"If my short game is in order, I feel I will be ready to play," he said.

The Wildcats have not played this course before, but McNeely played on it in a tournament last summer. He already has given his teammates some pointers.

"One of the guys on the team has been there, and I heard the greens are fairly large," Demory said. "Coach (Norris) said that we won't use the driver very much."

Norris said McNeely told the team about the greens.

"He shared with the guys that the greens are in good shape," Norris said. "The weather looks good for the next four to five days, and it should be a good outing for us."

Billboards, commercials not necessary for Stewart

Payne Stewart never experienced the prestige or publicity many athletes often taste, deserved or not. There were no commercials of children proclaiming, "I am Payne Stewart," or larger-than-life billboards splashed with his likeness.

Instead, Stewart experienced economic prosperity on the links under relatively modest coverage. Nothing surprising, considering golf never has dominated the media marketplace and recently only has gained a younger audience thanks to a Tiger. Chances are most casual golf fans will remember Stewart more for his extravagant attire of knee-high knickers and tam-o'-shanter hat than his clutch performance on the 18th hole of the U.S. Open in June.

But Stewart was what many colleagues would describe as a "presence" in the world of golf. Stewart matured from a young, brash player often criticized by his PGA Tour peers to a veteran of the game, more in tune with golf and life thanks to the lessons he learned early on.

A key figure in the U.S. Team's historic comeback at the Ryder Cup in September, Stewart was figured by many to captain the squad in the near future.

Sadly, that chance never will come.

Only 42 years old, Stewart died Monday morning in a plane crash in northeastern South Dakota. The Springfield, Mo., native was one of five passengers killed when the LearJet carrying Stewart to the Tour Championship in Houston lost control.

Tales of athletes cut down before their playing careers have run its course are an unfortunate reality, but Stewart's death affected the world of golf and those who knew him in a different way.

Stewart was an outspoken cut-up in the often conservative world

Replacing legends can be difficult task, as quarterback Jonathan Beasley now knows

BY RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

To give a little perspective to my column today, we're beginning with a trip back in time to 1992. The Buffalo Bills were just beginning their nearly half-a-decade as laughingstocks of the football world after their loss to the Giants in Super Bowl XXV. Elsewhere in the NFL, an injury to superstar Joe Montana had thrust former Tampa Bay castoff Steve Young into the San Francisco 49ers' starting lineup.

Young played well on paper at least, leading the NFL in passer rating that season, but sported only a 6-6 record as starter.

In the off-season, fans and media made no secret of the fact that they wanted no part of Young, preferring Steve Bono (bizarre but true) to hold things over until Montana's return.

The Niners' front office heard the cries of the masses, making every attempt to dump Young on draft day that year. Reportedly, the Niners at one point were close to sending Young to the Los Angeles Raiders, but the Raiders didn't think Young was worth San Francisco's asking price of a first-round pick and killed the deal.

San Francisco found itself "stuck" with Young, who won the Niners another Super Bowl in 1995 and has gone on to establish himself as the top-rated passer in NFL history as his probable Hall of Fame career draws to a close.

It seems strange now in light of all those accomplishments to think that Young was only a negotiation or two away from being dumped off San Francisco's roster, but it nearly happened.

That illustrates the point of my column today. Replacing legends is tough to do, particularly in the sporting world. It's as true today as it was in 1992, as you can see by the following exchange I had with a friend following K-State's 44-21 win over Oklahoma State on Saturday.

Friend: "Did you go down to Stillwater for the game?"

Me: "Yeah. Good game, huh? What did you think of Beasley?"

Friend: "He still sucks."

Me: "You're joking, right?"

Friend: "Nope."

Pretty stringent standards there, if you ask me. The guy accounts for six touchdowns during a road game against the nation's then-No. 4 defense, and in the eyes of some people, his football-playing ability still ranks down there with the Zac Wegners of the world? That doesn't sit well with me. Justified or not, that's the risk assumed, I suppose, in replacing a Heisman Trophy runner-up.

That's why, after today's column, I will not mention the "b"-word one more time when talking about this year's K-State football team. No more talk of Michael Bishop, I promise. No more use of Michael Bishop as a measuring stick for the Wildcats' quarterback position. No more reminiscing about, pining for or comparisons to Michael Bishop. The Wildcat offense is in the hands of Jonathan Beasley now, and it's time that fact hit home with K-State fans as a whole.

Though Bishop long since has moved on to the brighter lights and uglier uniforms of the NFL, only the name Snyder is spoken more often and with more reverence around Manhattan.

Even now, well into the Big 12 schedule, Bishop's legend still looms large over the Wildcat offense. If this year's K-State team beats Utah State by 40, well then it would've won by 60 with Bishop at the helm, judging by the boos of some fans. If Beasley throws two touchdown passes in a game, then Bishop would have thrown four, the thinking goes.

Comparisons between Bishop and Beasley are as unfair as they are easy to make. For one thing, the inexperienced Beasley inevitably is compared to the Michael Bishop of 1998, the returning starter and focal point of the offense.

A more appropriate comparison would be between Beasley this season and Bishop in 1997, his first year as starter. In that more logical comparison, an inexperienced Beasley comes out on top of an inexperienced Bishop. After seven games this year, Beasley is only 231 yards and 3 touchdowns behind what Bishop accomplished passing the ball in his 11 games his first year at K-State, and Beasley's 133.81 passing rating trumps Bishop's 128.48.

Even more than statistical differences, a key distinction is that the two simply aren't the same type of football player and shouldn't be compared as though they were. Bishop allowed his athleticism to take over the game, and it was usually enough to mask any deficiencies he had in other areas. Beasley, on the other hand, is a better-rounded football player — less apt to make spectacular plays but also less prone to making costly mistakes.

In addition, Beasley's understanding of the K-State offense gives him an edge over his predecessor, as well. When Bishop audibled, it was anyone's guess what the result would be, but Beasley has a knack for making adjustments at the line, as evidenced by K-State's dissection of the Cowboys' elaborate "46" defense Saturday. Beasley checked off over and over in a loud stadium against a high-pressure defense, something Bishop would've been hard-pressed to do.

I could go on chronicling the differences between the two, but I think you see my point. Is Beasley an All-American caliber football player? Probably not at this point, but nor was Michael Bishop at this stage in his career. Comparisons between the two are useless, so for now, let's all stop fretting over what we've lost with Bishop's departure and enjoy the achievements of this Wildcat team.

Who knows, with Nebraska looking beatable right now, this season could wind up being as wild a ride as last, and like it or not it's Beasley, not Bishop, or Adam Helm, or Ell Roberson, at the wheel. Could Beasley be a sort of latter-day Steve Young? Maybe, maybe not, but he deserves the support of K-State fans as he finds out.

Beasley named offensive player of week in Big 12

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

BEASLEY

Improvement.

That has been the mindset of every football player who ever has played at K-State under Head coach Bill Snyder, and on Saturday, junior quarterback Jonathan Beasley did just that.

Beasley was named the Southwestern Bell Big 12 Offensive Player of the Week following the No. 6 Cats' 44-21 trouncing of Oklahoma State on Saturday in Stillwater, Okla.

After experiencing a roller-coaster ride this season from game to game, Beasley threw what probably would be considered his best performance of the season.

Against the nation's then-No. 4 defensive unit, Beasley threw for a career high in yards with 311 on 13-25 passing, while adding four passing touchdowns. Beasley also ran nine times for 68 yards and two more scores.

His passing rating of 133.8 this season is good enough for 26th nationally, while his 19.8 yards per completion leads the nation.

Beasley has passed for 1,326 yards this season, including 10 touchdown passes and six interceptions.

Cutting the cost of your LAUNDRY LOAD

Exploration of city will lead to locations where students can save on washing

BY COLLEGIAN STAFF

Doing laundry tends to be an expensive job for college students without the benefit of in-home facilities.

Without the convenience of having Mom doing the laundry with a free-use washer and dryer can lead to the loss of many rolls of quarters.

"It's usually $1.25 to wash and $1.25 to dry each load," said Scott Chainey, senior in electrical engineering. "I do about four loads of laundry a week, so I spend about $10."

More than 15 different coin-operated laundry facilities service the Manhattan and Junction City area with varying prices.

Many of these facilities are self-serve, and others provide services for customers without the spare time to do their own washing.

Chainey said he frequents Cinderella Dry Cleaning and Laundry, while self-serve machines are available, students also have the option of requesting Cinderella employees finish their washing chores.

Customers are charged by the item, with prices ranging from $2 to $4. The coin-operated laundry facilities even does bed covers for $3.50.

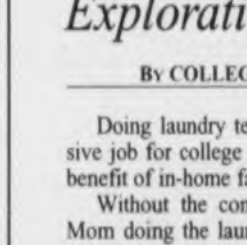
"It's a time saver," said Patricia Bish, an employee of Cinderellas.

Cinderella's hours are Monday-Friday from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. and Saturday from 7 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Another place that might be a little more cost efficient for students is Laundry Land. Laundry Land has prices for a single, double or triple load on the self-serve machines, with machines costing $1, $1.75, $2.25, respectively. It costs $.25 for 10 minutes of drying time.

Laundry Land, whose hours are Monday-Friday from 7:30 a.m. to 9 p.m. and Saturday and Sunday from 8 a.m. to 9 p.m., also provides a service for students without extra time for washing clothes.

Customers have the option of dropping off loads of laundry for the business' employees to clean. This service runs $.65 per pound of wash.



The Wash Palace, provides the same services as those at Laundry Land. One wash runs for $1 per load, with $.25 for 15 minutes of drying time. For drop-off laundry services, the Wash Palace also charges $.65 per pound. Their hours are from 7 a.m. until midnight daily.

Suds Y'R Duds does not provide drop-off services for their customers, but they are willing to help students who are low on quarters, said Christel Strifler, office manager for Wildcat Property Management, which operates the coin-operated laundry facilities.

"We have free dry from 5 a.m. to 1 p.m. in the small stack dryers, Monday through Friday," Strifler said.

Customers doing their wash during the wee hours of the morning in order to take advantage of the free dryers don't have to worry about safety issues, Strifler said. Suds Y'R Duds' front door comes equipped with a self-lock that keeps students secure while they wait for their wash. Students must come in before the doors lock at night.

Patience, research, luck all keys to making good investments

If there were one factor to which you or I could look in order to determine the future of an investment, we would have no need for investment advisers.

However, successful investing relies on many different factors, and security analysis is an art far removed from the accuracy of science. As a result, if you ask any 10 analysts the same question, you likely will receive as many different answers.

At any time, there might be 8,000 good investments, 400 excellent ones and 20 that no reasonable investor would pass up. Our challenge is to find these 20 among the thousands of companies traded publicly. Finding these companies requires a combination of patience in reviewing companies, dedication when the one we search for seems elusive, and luck when we find that one.

These 20 are companies that are good yet whose shares trade at such low prices that investment in them carries virtually no risk. Not to say investing does not carry risk; it certainly does, and recognizing the risk is important to successful investing.

Risk, then, is not event risk, which can be avoided substantially with a thorough analysis, but the risk of paying too much for a share of stock. Strengths that mitigate this risk are called factors of safety. With sufficient factors of safety, provided a company's shares are priced reasonably, the risk of owning that company's shares is minimal. Does this sound too good to be true? That's why there only might be 20 of these stocks, or fewer, mixed in with the thousands at any time.

Let's take Microsoft as an example. Financially, Microsoft is what many investors dream of finding, often six years before they even hear about the company. Even today, Microsoft has many tangible factors of safety: strong historical revenue growth, strong financials, strong management, a strong market position and others. Whatever the growth of the company itself, we have to judge the company's value as an investment relative to the price at which we can buy shares in the company. To paraphrase Ralph Nader, Microsoft is not a safe investment at any price. We must determine whether a sufficient margin of safety exists between the value we see in Microsoft based on its factors and the market price of the shares. If we could buy Microsoft for $10 a share, a large margin of safety would exist and Microsoft would be a good investment. If the shares traded at $900, the margin of safety would be eliminated and the shares speculative. Based on the market price, we might want to invest in Microsoft or instead search for companies whose earnings growth, management, and other quantitative and qualitative factors are similar to those of Microsoft but whose margin of safety between value and market price is greater.

Searching for such companies can be difficult, especially when a starting point is not readily clear. However, investing permits a number of starting points, so the task becomes choosing one and pursuing it rather than trying to find the best from the start. A good way to start is to consider companies with which you are familiar, such as Nike, Federal Express, Commerce Bank or Ford Motor Co. These companies already fulfill one of our basic investment requirements: knowing the business of the company in which you invest. Price-to-earnings ratios also might be a good starting point for considering investments. This ratio provides information on the market's value of a company's earnings. Although calculated in a number of ways, a price-to-earnings ratio generally is determined by dividing the market price of a share by the company's earnings from the past 12 months. Most price-to-earnings ratios rightfully exclude extraordinary items from their calculations, such as gains or losses from the sale of a business unit, which do not reflect the ongoing profitability of a company's business.

Price-to-earnings ratios are valuable measures of a company. Generally, low price-to-earnings ratios are preferable to high ones. High ratios can suggest dips in earnings that are not expected to continue or companies that the market thinks will grow at a fast pace in future years, such as Microsoft or Nokia. On the other hand, many reliable companies that turn in strong annual profits, but are not expected to grow at an unusual pace, have low ratios.

This ratio, however, does have limits. Earnings for the previous year are not necessarily indicative of earnings over time. A better understanding of a company's price-to-earnings ratio can be determined by calculating an average ratio for the past five or 10 years to add a factor of safety. To do this, total the company's earnings over the past several years, divide by the number of years and use this value to divide the price of the company's shares.

When beginning your security analysis, a good method of getting started is to present your ideas to an investment adviser or other knowledgeable individual, even if you are not given any specific advice. Most of doing anything well is having experience in doing it. Researching companies and taking one's findings to a trusted resource for comment is the best way to learn.

It is not necessary that you accept as gospel everything you are told by whomever you ask. You must make your own investment decisions and adopt a personal view of what investments are right for you and what factors are most important to judge, but having another's input can yield insights that you might have missed or other factors you might want to check out.

terse statement Monday.

"I do not mourn his departure," he said.

Buchanan, whose insurgent campaigns hobbled Republican front-runners in 1992 and 1996, failed for eight months to break out of second-tier status in the Republican presidential field. Though low in polls and money, Buchanan is considered a threat by Republicans.

"There's no place for conservatives to go other than to Pat," said former White House chief of staff John Sununu.

Most polls substantiate GOP fears, although some surveys suggest Buchanan would attract as many Democrats as Republicans.

Trump, who called Buchanan a Hitler lover, dropped his GOP affiliation Monday in preparation for a potential Reform Party bid. He will decide early next year whether to challenge Buchanan.

Ventura, the nation's highest-elected Reform Party member, pledged to remain governor through 2002 but might be wavering. Perot has not ruled out a third presidential bid.

More than $12 million in federal money is at stake, earmarked for the Reform Party nominee.

Buchanan hopes to forge a coalition of hard-hat Democrats, hard-core social conservatives and Reform Party stalwarts who helped Perot earned 19 percent of the vote in 1992.

Many of his backers are Perot allies. Ventura is urging Trump to run.

"I like what he has to say about trade. I can put the abortion stuff aside," said Valli Sharpe-Geisler, past chairwoman of the California Reform Party who attended the announcement.

Buchanan promised to protect U.S. jobs from unfair trade, fight against abortion, keep the nation out of foreign entanglements, abolish racial quotas, cut taxes, eliminate the Department of Education and help return America to better days.

Tailoring his standard speech for his new party, he also denounced the use of unregulated soft money in politics and accused both parties of writing laws with lobbyists looking over their shoulders.

The two parties have become twins on a host of issues, Buchanan said.

"Neither fights today with conviction and courage to rescue God's country from the cultural and moral pit into which she has fallen," he said.

And neither party is open to dissident voices, which is why he was forced to leave, Buchanan said.

CRASH

superintendent of the South Dakota Highway Patrol. There were no survivors, South Dakota Gov. Bill Janklow said.

"The plane had pretty much nosed straight into the ground," said Lesley Braun, who lives about two miles from the site. "There's not a lot of debris spread out a long ways."

She said her husband was among those who saw the plane coming down.

"They saw it nose down, so they hopped in the vehicle and raced towards where it was going down and were the first ones on the scene," she said.

No one on the ground was hurt, White House spokesman Joe Lockhart said.

Stewart, 42, was one of the most recognizable players in golf because of his trademark clothing. He won 18 tournaments around the world, including three major championships.

In June, he won his second U.S. Open with a 15-foot putt, the longest putt to ever decide that championship on the final hole.

"I'm proud of the fact that my faith in God is so much stronger, and I'm so much more at peace with myself than I've ever been in my life," Stewart said after the win. "Where I was with my faith last year and where I am now is leaps and bounds."

On Monday, visitors, including fellow golfer Mark O'Meara, began arriving at Stewart's home in an exclusive Orlando community. A neighbor, visibly upset, jumped into a car next door.

The Rev. Jim Henry, retired pastor for First Baptist Church of Orlando who used to minister to the Stewart family, was one of those outside the home.

"He was a wonderful Christian who had Christ in his life and somehow in his death," Henry said. "That brought a great sense of peace to his family in a difficult and tragic time."

Stewart and his wife, Tracey, had two children, Chelsea, 13, and Aaron, 10.

In Texas, fellow golfer Duffy Waldorf, preparing to practice Monday, told KTRH-AM in Houston that he considered turning around and going home, when he heard the news.

"He's an irreplaceable guy, not just for his playing record," Waldorf said, citing Stewart's presence on the course and the consistency of his play.

Lockhart said two FAA officials had been dispatched to the scene of the crash, as had a National Transportation Safety Board representative.

Planes that fly above 12,000 feet normally are pressurized, because passengers would have difficulty breathing the thin air above that altitude.

If there is a pressurization problem, those aboard the aircraft could lose consciousness slowly or, if an aircraft broke a door or window seal, perish in seconds from hypoxia, or oxygen deficiency.

President Dwight D. Eisenhower, like Huck Boyd, understood the concept of accountability, he said.

Dole related a story to the audience about Gen. Eisenhower's decision to go through with the Normandy Invasion during World War II. Eisenhower left a note in case his mission failed, saying he took complete responsibility for the failure.

Dole said Eisenhower exemplified the positive qualities a strong leader should have.

Members of the audience said Dole was more light-hearted than he is portrayed by the media.

"He has a really good sense of humor, and I think he took losing well because he was able to make jokes about it," said Rachel Gordinier, sophomore in family life and community service. "I respect him for the fact that he supports the president without necessarily agreeing with the decision."

Learning how to deal with success and failure is an integral part of growing and learning, Dole said.

"Success and failure are not polar opposites," he said. "How you deal with success is pretty easy. But how do you deal with failure?"

CAMPAIGN

and Al Gore will compete for the Democratic nomination, he said.

"I think it will probably be a pretty close race on both sides," Dole said.

Dole said Pat Buchanan's switch from the Republican Party to the Reform Party was a good move for all parties involved.

"Pat's a great critic. He's a great news guy," he said. "I don't believe he represents the mainstream Republican party. I wish him limited success."

Dole commented on the possibility of celebrities Donald Trump and Warren Beatty running for president.

"They have every right to run," he said. "Will they really bring anything to America? We shouldn't put too much focus on celebrity candidates."

North Dakota University student acquited of murder of infant daughter

BY BRIAN WITTE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BISMARCK, N.D. — Ten days after he began taking a widely used medicine called Adderall to control his attention deficit-hyperactivity disorder and help him with his college studies, Ryan Ehlis slipped into a psychotic fog and killed his infant daughter.

God, he said, told him to do it.

Today, the 24-year-old University of North Dakota student is out of jail and back in school, acquitted of murder by a judge who ruled his psychotic state was an extremely rare side effect of Adderall.

Medical experts and the drug's manufacturer say despite the slaying, Adderall remains a safe and effective drug for controlling attention deficit-hyperactivity disorder, or ADHD.

Within days after taking the medicine in January, Ehlis started hearing voices.

He believed God was telling him to leave his body and bring his daughter with him to save the world, said his lawyer, John Thelen.

His conditioned worsened until, on Jan. 30, Ehlis killed his five-week-old daughter, Tara, with a shotgun, then shot himself in the abdomen. He recovered from the wound and was charged with murder.

Earlier this month, psychiatrists testified before a judge that the shootings happened solely because of a psychotic state caused by the prescription drug. Judge Debbie Kleven agreed, ruling Ehlis lacked the capacity to understand what he was doing.

Ehlis has declined comment on the case but said he returned to normal days after he stopped taking the medication. He is back home with his common-law wife and three other children.

"I'm doing very well, and my family is doing pretty good, too, considering the circumstances," he said.

The drug's labeling warns that in very rare cirumstances, it can cause psychotic episodes at recommended doses.

"We have always been aware there was a very slight risk of psychotic side effects with this drug, but this was the most severe case that's ever occurred," said Stefan Antonsson, vice president of marketing for Shire Richwood Inc., the Florence, Ky., manufacturer of the drug.

Since Adderall was made available on a widespread basis in 1996, the company has received 10 reports of general psychotic events from the drug's use, Antonsson said.

"They all seemed to resolve without significant injury to the user or other people," he said.

More than a million Adderall prescriptions were written in 1997, Antonsson said.

He believed God was telling him to leave his body and bring his daughter with him to save the world, said his lawyer, John Thelen.

That figure rose to 2.3 million in 1998, and in the first nine months of this year, the number has increased to 2.7 million, he said.

During clinical trials of the drug, Antonsson said, there were no reported instances of psychotic disorders.

Clinton orders drug-cost study, criticizes pharmaceutical industry advertisements

BY TERENCE HUNT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton ordered a federal study of drug costs Monday, saying American senior citizens shouldn't have to get on the bus to Canada to buy medicine at lower prices.

He also accused the pharmaceutical industry of flat-out falsehoods in a multimillion-dollar advertising campaign aimed at killing his proposal to include voluntary prescription coverage in Medicare, the health insurance program for the elderly and disabled.

The president escalated an already bitter feud between the administration and the drug industry over the government's role in health care. His action also guaranteed an election-year fight between Democrats and Republicans over Medicare drug benefits, now that Clinton's prescription proposal has been shelved by the GOP.

Industry ads, featuring a character called Flo and her husband Bill, claim Clinton's Medicare plan would put big government in America's medicine cabinets and force all seniors into a government-run plan. The White House denies those charges and says seniors pay too much for drugs and that they need help.

"We have to expose these deceptions and give the American people the facts."

— Bill Clinton, president

"We cannot stand by and watch the pharmaceutical industry go on and distort this debate," the president said in a speech in the Old Executive Office Building. "We have to expose these deceptions and give the American people the facts."

Clinton directed that the drug study be completed within 90 days. It will look at different prices for the most commonly used drugs for people with and without insurance coverage. It also will examine drug spending by people of different ages and incomes.

"No senior should have to forgo or cut back on lifesaving medication because of the cost," the president said.

He said, for example, a popular cholesterol-lowering drug costs $44 for 60 pills in Canada, but $102 in New Hampshire.

"It's wrong and we have to deal with it," Clinton said.

Attacking industry claims, Clinton said, "I wish they'd spend this ad money explaining why seniors have to get on the bus and go to Canada to buy drugs at less than half the price they can buy them in America."

Alan F. Holmer, president of the industry trade group, the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, said some drugs may be more expensive in the United States than in Canada, because of Canadian or provincial government price controls.

"Our view is that America has the best health care system in the world and we don't want to copy the Canadian system with its rationing of health care, its limits on access to medicines and its waiting lines that are often three times longer than in the U.S.," Holmer said.

He also defended drug industry ads that oppose Clinton's proposals.

Clinton said 13 million elderly Americans have no prescription drug coverage and millions more have inadequate coverage.

"The Republicans are squandering a golden moment," the president said.

But Rep. Bill Archer, R-Texas, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, said Medicare premiums would double for seniors under the president's prescription plan.

Study suggests humans, Neanderthals coexisted

By PAUL RECER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Neanderthals and modern humans might have coexisted in central Europe for thousands of years or possibly even mated, according to new radiocarbon dating of bones from a cave in Croatia.

Bones found in the Vindija cave site in Croatia have yielded the youngest dates ever, 28,000 to 29,000 years, for Neanderthal remains, said Fred H. Smith, an anthropologist at Northern Illinois University.

Smith said it was the strongest evidence yet that the primitive Neanderthal lived at the same time and in the same place as did modern human beings.

Neanderthals, a primitive hominid with prominent brow, coarse jaw, short lower limbs and a prominence at the back of the skull, are thought to have arisen in Africa more than 250,000 years ago. They are thought to have appeared in Europe about 100,000 years ago and eventually were replaced by modern humans.

Specimens for modern humans dated at 90,000 to 100,000 years have been found in Africa and in the Middle East. Modern human bones found in central Europe have been dated at about 32,000 years.

The new Neanderthal age dates are based on material removed from a jawbone and a skull bone found in the Croatian cave. The specimens had earlier been dated at 45,000 years using a gamma ray counter. The new dates of 28,000 to 29,000 were determined using a more accurate method called accelerator radiocarbon dating, which measures the level in the specimen of a carbon isotope.

The new dates for the Neanderthal, Smith said, mean there was an overlap of 3,000 to 4,000 years with modern humans in central Europe.

Smith said the find strengthens the theory that Neanderthals and modern humans did mate and produce hybrid children that had genes from both species.

He said he and others believe there are body features in bones from 30,000-year-old human specimens that suggest a Neanderthal contribution to the European gene pool.

ing fun playing golf, and I didn't want to continue," he said. "I had a wakeup call to the fact that this is what I'm good at, and I'm still good at it."

He won his first major championship in 1989, taking the PGA championship at Kemper Lakes outside Chicago, beating Mike Reid by a stroke. Two years later, he won the U.S. Open at Hazeltine in Minnesota after an 18-hole playoff with Scott Simpson.

But Stewart then went into a slump, going eight years with only one victory and becoming surlier with galleries and with the media the longer it went on.

He nearly won the U.S. Open last year, taking a four-stroke lead into the final round at before losing by one stroke to Lee Janzen. But the transformation of Stewart already was underway.

The U.S. Open win year secured Stewart a spot on his first Ryder Cup team in six years. He embodied the passion of the Ryder Cup and boldly suggested one reason the United States had not won since 1993 was that he was not on the team.

He won only a half-point at the tournament last month, but his presence was considered a motivating factor for the Americans, who staged the greatest comeback in history to win back the Cup.

Along with 11 career victories on the PGA Tour, Stewart also won seven times around the world. His career winnings were $11.7 million.

Part of his turnaround was a newfound faith, drawn to church through his children, 13-year-old Chelsea and 10-year-old Aaron.

"I'm a lot older and I'm a lot wiser. I'm more mature," he said earlier this year. "I'm not going to blink and miss my family growing up. When I'm out at the golf course, I'm going to prepare myself to be the best I can. And when I'm home, I'm going to be a father."

He also said his faith in God had blossomed.

of golf. His attire and attitude established a devout fan base and nearly overshadowed his on-course accomplishments of two-time U.S. Open champion, five-time Ryder Cup veteran and third all-time in career earnings.

Perhaps nothing illustrated Stewart's change better than his dramatic victory at the U.S. Open. Battling throughout the back nine with Phil Mickelson, Stewart captured the title in rare fashion, knocking in a clutch 15-foot putt on the 18th hole.

Instead of reveling in the victory with friends and family, Stewart unleashed tears of joy and embraced Mickelson, whose wife was expecting a baby in a hospital far away.

"Good luck with the baby," Stewart said during the embrace. "There's nothing like being a father."

No swagger. No taunting. Just a sincere message of well-being to his competitor.

The modesty and appreciation was just another change in Stewart, whose faith was brought up often following the tragedy.

"He was a wonderful Christian who had Christ in his life and somehow in his death," the Rev. Jim Henry, who used to ministered to Stewart's family in Orlando, told ESPN outside the family's home after the crash. "That brought a great sense of peace to his family in a difficult and tragic time."

In the underexposed world of golf, Payne Stewart rose to prominence and popularity due to his style. But substance was what truly defined Stewart's legacy, and that will remain in the memories of those fortunate enough to know the man behind the knickers.

Residents could lose trailer homes

■ Owners fear area manager will send out eviction letters.

BY ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Blue Valley Mobile Home Park residents aren't sure whether they'll have a place to live next year.

Affordable Residential Communities, a company that owns and manages manufactured home communities, bought Blue Valley in May.

Vince Petre, non-traditional freshman in secondary education and Blue Valley resident, said Willie Wells, the area manager for ARC, told him the residents would receive eviction letters sometime in January or February.

Wells would not comment on whether he had said this, and he said he had to refer anyone asking about it to the public relations official for ARC.

John Brown, ARC public relations official, said the residents' fears of being evicted are unfounded. However, residents who own a 1982 manufactured home or older model, and want to sell their home, will have to make changes meeting the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development standards.

In 1976 the federal government got involved in HUD statutes, and HUD imposed a series of safety and manufacturing improvements on manufactured homes, formerly called trailers or mobile homes. Some of these improvements include fire safety and ability to withstand strong winds.

"Homes built prior to 1982 will be able to remain in Blue Valley," Brown said. "Should they decide to sell their older homes, they would have to be brought up to HUD 1976 standards."

If the homes were not brought up to standards when sold, then they would have to be removed from the property, he said.

It would be up to the owner of the home to bring it to HUD standards, Brown said.

ARC owns and manages two other mobile home parks in Manhattan besides Blue Valley: Colonial Gardens and Riverchase.

Petre said ARC comes into communities, buys the parks and then evicts the residents.

"There's a monopoly going on here that when they buy a park they force the old trailers out — they just evict them," he said. "In our particular trailer park, we've got elderly people who have lived there for 30 years, and they're not bad trailers, but ARC is going to give them eviction notices because the trailers are too old."

Evelyn Booth, an elderly Blue Valley resident, said she has to move her trailer.

"My trailer is too old," she said. "They only want them a certain age and certain length and certain width."

Booth said she moved to Blue Valley after she had to move out of North Crest Mobile Home Court because the owners had to close it.

"I can't keep up with the moves," she said. "I'm too old for this. I thought for sure when I moved here that would be the last move."

Booth said she won't receive her official eviction notice until January or February, but she said the owners have said residents will be evicted.

"I'm trying to sell my trailer," Booth said. "I don't know who's going to buy it, though, because there's nowhere to move it."

Petre also said the lot rent has doubled from $100 to $200.

Brown said that could be possible, but he didn't know what the exact increase was or if there was one.

"The usual pattern is that rents do, in fact, increase," he said.

After ARC buys a manufactured home park, Brown said, it improves the living community.

"Rents are going to increase directly as a result of making them a much, much better place to live," Brown said.

Virginia Stilley, who owns a majority of the mobile homes in the park, said she is worried that the people living in her homes

World War II shifts focus from academics to battle as 5,000 alumni, students called to duty

THE KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
WAR MOVES JAR K-STATE

The Collegian on Dec. 9, 1941, reported the campus would be affected by the outbreak of war.

Editor's Note:
■ This is the fifth in a series of stories celebrating the arrival of the year 2000. Each week, the Collegian will highlight a story from each decade of the century.

Mary Line, a 1944 Kansas State College graduate, remembers exactly where she was Dec. 7, 1941.

"I was at 1014 Vattier in my apartment that I shared with three girls. I was listening to the news," she said. "I went upstairs and cried."

Few students were affected more by the news that Japan had bombed Pearl Harbor than KSC's 1,200 men and 200 ROTC officers. They had taken an oath that assured their participation in the war. For them, the oath, "I do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all threats foreign and domestic," had new meaning on that day, the 1942 Royal Purple reported.

Some who hadn't taken the oath were quick to respond to the news. Less than 24 hours after after the United States declared war, Ellis Boldra, then a sophomore in mechanical engineering, went to Topeka to become the first KSC student to enlist in the U.S. Army.

"I considered enlisting for some time, and that declaration of war clinched it," Boldra told the 1942 Royal Purple.

KSC President Francis D. Farrell didn't want students to rush into combat, however. At the request of the National Headquarters of Selective Services, he ordered all men 21 years of age or older to bring their notice of classification cards to a general assembly. Farrell urged the male students to remain in school until finished with college or until they were called to fight.

"They must keep their heads and decide questions on the basis of fact rather than on the basis of rumor, excitement or heedless enthusiasm," he said. "It is not unpatriotic to wait, and by staying in school the government will know where to find you when it needs your help."

Called to Duty

It wasn't long before help was needed, and many of those men were called to action.

"I knew my boyfriend would have to go to war, and he did," Line said.

Since 1935, KSC had required all able-bodied men to complete two years of military training during their freshman and sophomore years, regardless of whether they enlisted. With the declaration of war, many who had completed training expected to be drafted.

Because of this training, Oscar Norby, a 1944 graduate, said he knew it was likely he would be drafted and enter the war.

"(Male students) were all prime candidates," he said. "The guys who didn't get drafted would be those with a physical fitness exemption."

The 1943 Royal Purple reported that men who completed ROTC training by January 1942 reported for service schools and were commissioned within three months of graduation. By 1944, 5,000 alumni and students had been called to active duty by enlisting or through the draft. Four of those served as generals. More than 100 were listed as prisoners, missing in action or dead.

When the war ended, KSC had contributed more soldiers and officers to the Citizens back city's defense in suit filed by Wal-Mart

BY TRACY DOILE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A group of Manhattan citizens have asked to join the city's defense in the Wal-Mart lawsuit.

The Manhattan City Commission defeated a re-zoning application that would have allowed Wal-Mart to build a supercenter near the intersection of Seth Child Road and Fort Riley Boulevard in August by a unanimous vote.

The city now faces a lawsuit by Manhattan Project L.L.C. to have the district judge review the proceedings to see if the decision was made inappropriately.

The project developers are asking for monetary damages in excess of $75,000 plus attorney fees saying in the lawsuit that the decision was based on improper and illegal factors.

Price T. Banks of Lawrence represents the group of 14 citizens who have come forward to help the defense.

"By filing a petition to intervene as defendants, we help the city defend the suit," he said.

Banks said the court is likely to have a hearing on the petition to decide if it will allow the citizens to intervene. Banks said most members of the group have a vested interest in backing the city.

"They intend to work hard to protect their interest," he said.

Joe Knopp, Wal-Mart's attorney, said there is no basis for these citizens to think the city of Manhattan won't competently protect their rights.

"Many of them have no uniqueness from the other 40,000 residents of Manhattan or the other 100,000 people that use Seth Child Road," he said.

Amy Carter is one of the concerned citizens willing to join the defense. She has been involved from the beginning of the proposed Wal-Mart.

"I thought the City Commission was quite fair in listening," she said. "I don't know why they'd want to bring a lawsuit against the city commission."

Carter said she was in favor of the new Wal-Mart until she saw the proposal.

"I was like, this isn't going to work," she said. "I grew up right behind the area, so that part of the town is considered my home."

Carter said she intends to stay informed and remain involved in the discussions.

"Our goal is to get this matter in front of a judge as quickly as possible," Knopp said.

Committee OKs additional funds for computers

BY JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A bill to update University Counseling Services' biofeedback computers was passed 10-0 by the Privilege Fee Committee on Tuesday.

The amount was amended to $3,176 after University Counseling Services asked a computer expert to see if there was any way to cut the cost of upgrading — an action recommended by the committee. The original amount of the request was $4,496.

The request is considered an emergency and will be taken out of reserve accounts, which will not affect student privilege fees in any way, Ryan Walker, committee chair, said.

The request had been kept in committee due to insufficient information, Walker said.

■ BILL INFO?
There will be an informational meeting on the proposed bill to restructure the Fine Arts Council at 5 p.m. Monday in the Big 12 Room of the K-State Student Union.

"This is the emergency request," he said. "The actual budgets for Lafene and UCS will be before the committee next semester."

At that time, the committee might look into ways to incorporate the equipment budget of University Counseling Services into the regular budget, Walker said.

A biofeedback computer measures various physiological responses of the stress/relaxation response system, said Fred Newton Director of University Counseling Services, during an earlier interview.

"The number-one problem we hear from students is stress," Newton said. "With the biofeedback, we can immediately see what is going on with a person and how they respond to stress. It is very specified, state-of-the-art and highly used at UCS."

The committee also unanimously passed a bill to increase the operations budget and decrease the equipment budget of Student Publications Inc.

If passed, the operations budget will increase by 5.88 percent to $269,994, and the equipment budget will decrease 4.76 percent to $60,001.20, Walker said.

"The increase won't affect fees at all," he said. "Student enrollment increases allow us some spending

Labette County man named judge in local sheriff's trial

TOPEKA — The state Supreme Court has appointed Labette County District Judge Robert J. Fleming to handle the perjury case of Shawnee County Sheriff Dave Meneley

Fleming replaces Shawnee County District Judge Marla Luckert, who withdrew from the case. The Supreme Court made its appointment on Thursday.

Meneley's attorneys, Jonathan Phelps, Fred W. Phelps Jr. and Elizabeth Phelps, had asked Luckert to remove herself from the case because of potential complications that might result from her involvement in another case.

Luckert is one of three judges assigned to a civil case filed by Attorney General Carla Stovall seeking to remove Meneley from office. That trial is scheduled to begin Nov. 8, while a preliminary hearing on Meneley's two perjury charges is set for Nov. 29.

Both cases involve allegations that Meneley gave false testimony when he said that he didn't know a deputy had been using drugs until that deputy went public earlier this year.

Fraternity member injures 3 when prank goes bad at MIT

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — An explosive device blew up in the hand of a student dressed as the Grim Reaper in a lecture hall at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology on Tuesday, injuring him and two other people.

The explosion apparently was a prank gone awry, MIT spokesman Bob Sales said. The student was part of a group from the Phi Kappa Sigma fraternity who had been promoting a Halloween party.

As they walked through the aisle of the lecture hall during an engineering class, the device exploded in the 18-year-old student's hand. It was intended to have been simply a flash of light, school officials said.

The student, whose name was not released, was hospitalized in fair condition. Two others were treated at the MIT infirmary.

The building was evacuated and the police bomb squad called in.

MIT is well known for its pranks, or hacks, which date back at least to the 1920s.

Four years ago, hackers put a police car on top of the university's Great Dome. Another year, they dressed the dome in an enormous beanie topped with a propeller.

New space station boosted to avoid flying space junk

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Flight controllers boosted the orbit of the international space station by about a mile Tuesday to avoid dangerous space junk.

NASA spokesman Kyle Herring said the maneuver — the first of its kind for the new station — went well. In June, flight controllers in Moscow botched an attempt to move the station out of the way of a piece of space debris. But the junk ended up passing well clear of the station.

The U.S. Space Command in Colorado Springs, Colo., which tracks orbiting objects, notified NASA over the weekend that a spent Pegasus rocket body would pass within a mile of the space station today, Herring said. The maneuver Tuesday widened the gap to a safe 15 miles.

City's 1st, only black mayor remembered for his service

SALINA, Kan. — Robert Caldwell, Salina's only black mayor who served on everything from the Boy Scouts to the Kansas Board of Regents, mostly just knew how to have a good time.

Always wearing his trademark sunflower, Caldwell could make a friend in an instant, about 250 people recalled Monday at funeral services.

Caldwell, 86, died last Wednesday.

"Robert Caldwell lived a life that imitated the gospel, because people around him were made better," said the Rev. Rueben D. Eckels, who presided over the services.

Caldwell served eight years on the Salina City Commission, including three terms as mayor. He served a term in the state Legislature. He was active in the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and served on the Board of Regents.

Caldwell taught in the Salina public schools for 39 years and was city and state teacher of the year in 1976. He was inducted into the Kansas Teachers Hall of Fame in 1979.

He worked with the Boy Scouts, and as a swimming instructor.

People who spoke at the funeral remembered he did all of those things with passion and dedication.

Toy Caldwell-Colbert, one of Caldwell's two daughters, said her father was the most charismatic person she had ever known.

"He didn't know a stranger," she said. "My friends were his friends and his friends were our friends."

Rubin joins nation's largest financial company, Citigroup

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin joined Citigroup Inc., the nation's largest financial company, where he will use his business and political background to help shape the firm's strategy, officials said Tuesday.

Rubin was elected to the New York-based financial giant's board and will serve as chairman of its executive committee. He will work with John Reed and Sanford Weill, the company's chairmen and co-chief executive officers, in a newly created three-person office of the chairman, the company said.

"Bob will participate in strategic managerial and operational matters of the company, but will have no line responsibilities," Reed and Weill said in a statement.

Rubin, who took over at the Treasury Department in 1995, was widely regarded as one of its most successful secretaries. When he stepped down in July, the U.S. economy was continuing an unprecedented expansion and shaken overseas economies were on the mend.

effort than all schools in the nation but one — West Point. Fifty-eight alumni and students died in combat.

Back on the home front

On campus, the administration prepared soldiers for battle with the help of the Board of Regents. The board changed curriculum requirements, making it possible for students to graduate in three years rather than four. The changes also granted semester credit concessions to students withdrawing for military service. This way, if a student was called to duty in the middle of a semester, he received credit for the classes in which he was enrolled.

"Supposedly, they could stay in school and finish the semester, but that didn't always happen," Mary Line said. "My husband enlisted and was supposed to finish the semester, but the ink was hardly dry before he was sent to Leavenworth and then to Europe."

Department curriculum adjustments reflected the needs of a world at war. No department was left untouched by curriculum changes.

The 1943 Royal Purple reported, "Every department is stepping up its training program in order to release technically trained people for war activities."

Campus organizations served the cause as well, sometimes willingly and sometimes without choice. The Student Council set up a booth and sold war stamps once a week. The Glider Club was grounded when civil aeronautics authorities suspended flight of all air ships from non-approved air fields.

Men kept leaving and leaving

Social gatherings eventually were affected by the war. Phyllis Hurty Eyestone, a 1946 graduate, said she remembers one of her favorite activities, dime dances, changed as the war dragged on.

"We would pay a dime, and they'd have a jukebox, and that was really fun. We met lots and lots of people that way," she said.

But dime dances changed during the war.

"Originally when I came to campus, there were a lot of men. It was pretty evenly divided. There were lots of cutins at dime dances," Eyestone said. "But the men kept leaving and leaving."

The 1943 Royal Purple echoed Eyestone's sentiments.

"The long arms of Uncle Sam reached out, leaving Kansas State looking like a virtual female seminary when second semester registration rolled around," it reported.

Baseball, a casualty of war

Dime dances were not the only events affected by war. Without men, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics made cuts.

The Collegian reported that KSC was one of the first schools in the Midwest to announce it would continue intercollegiate sports. Other schools would follow, at first without the support of the Big Six athletic conference. Eventually, the conference gave its approval for the continuation of intercollegiate sports, but with only three sports — football, basketball and track — on the roster. Baseball at KSC became a casualty of the war.

The college had other athletic hurdles: many of the university's coaches enlisted. Football coaches Hobbs Adams and Bill Shuttle, along with swim coach Conrad S. Moll, joined the Navy. B.R. Patterson, the wrestling coach, signed with the Army.

The problem of coachless teams was solved by moving remaining coaches around. The baseball coach shared football duties with track coach Ward Haylett.

The basketball team didn't lose a coach the first season after the United States entered the war, but it did lose all but six of its 20 games. The Collegian reported, "The defeats were due in part to the loss of three lettermen who were called to duty in mid-season."

After the final game, basketball coach Owen Cochrane enlisted in the Navy.

Students on campus continued to watch for news about World War II. All able-bodied men were required to complete two years of military training during their freshman and sophomore years on campus.

Soldiers had the sidewalks

Shortly following that season, men began to return to campus. However, they weren't students. By early 1943, the U.S. Army needed increasing numbers of trained airplane pilots, but the Army had neither the facilities nor the instructors to train the ever-growing numbers needed for the war. KSC had the facilities and instructors. So, enlisted men were sent to the college for training.

About 500 trainees arrived on campus Feb. 26, 1943. Housing the trainees presented a new set of problems for a campus committed to the war effort. Because KSC did not have any men's residence halls, soldiers moved into KSC's empty fraternity houses.

When the fraternities couldn't house all of them, Van Zile, the women's residence hall, became a home for soldiers. Because of the changes, one of Line's classes was moved from Van Zile.

"Van Zile was full of soldiers," Line said. "I remember marching all the way up the hill for class instead of having it in Van Zile."

The influx of soldiers changed class meeting space and campus politics.

The school abandoned its smoking policy shortly after soldiers arrived because soldiers wanted to smoke on campus. Line said soldiers generally got their way on campus.

"They had the sidewalks. They had the right-of-way on campus, because patriotism was important to us," she said.

Politics changed again when the president of the student body was drafted, and the students elected the first female student body president, Ethlinda Parrish.

Her cousin, Manhattan resident Don Parrish, said the students made a good choice.

"She was a good student and very popular," Parrish said.

Milton S. Eisenhower, leader of more than a glorified information booth

Another leadership change brought ties between personalities on the battlefield and campus to the school. Farrell resigned and the only K-State alumnus to ever serve as school president, Milton S. Eisenhower, took office in 1943.

When the war began, Milton Eisenhower was the associate director of the Office of War Information. When he was elected to preside over KSC, he left helping lead the nation through the war to his brother, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower. Milton concentrated his efforts on leading the college through the war.

In his inaugural speech after his election as KSC president, Milton Eisenhower stressed the importance of training students to have sound judgment by instilling human values in them.

"A college or university that is aimlessly neutral, skeptical or cynical with respect to human values and moral concepts is essentially nothing more than a glorified information booth," he said.

Part of instilling values meant keeping the campus running through the war while doing everything possible to help the effort. To that end, he organized a scrap drive in cooperation with the national scrap drive, asking department heads to collect scrap material within their departments.

"The president has an eye for the future while keeping the machinery running today's college program well-oiled," the 1945 Royal Purple reported.

Building the bomb

While the 1945 Royal Purple reported the virtues of Milton S. Eisenhower, another KSC leader, physics professor Alvin B. Cardwell, was busy working on a project that eventually would end the war — the atomic bomb.

Cardwell worked on the Manhattan Atomic Bomb Project in Oak Ridge, Tenn., during the war. He helped separate materials for the bomb. The Kansas Industrialist, a KSC faculty newspaper, reported that when Cardwell started work on the project, he hoped against hope the atomic bomb would prove impossible.

"The occasion of the dropping of the atomic bomb was not a time for rejoicing," he told the Industrialist. "It was an occasion which presented to the world untold difficult problems — the most difficult yet presented."

When he returned to his position as head of the Department of Physics after the war, he spoke of what he helped create and what kinds of weapons he feared in the future.

"I can now reveal that already work has progressed on the culture and on the possible widespread use of the deadliest bacteria and virus. And our capacity for making radioactive gas, a weapon more dreadful than the atomic bomb, is immense," he told the Industrialist.

"While nuclear war is bad, biological war doubtless will be worse," he told the Collegian in 1947.

What it all meant

Eyestone said even with the war shadowing campus, her college experience still was full of youthful optimism.

"We were young. I don't think we thought a lot about death or anything," she said. "A lot of boys were going, but I don't think we thought they were going to be mutilated and killed."

Line said the war caused the campus to grow up quickly.

"We became more serious," she said. "We were the right age to realize what it all meant."

1940-1949 Campus facts

Enrollment numbers saw new lows because of World War II, and also all-time highs. In 1949, enrollment hit 7,435.

In 1944, Milton S. Eisenhower was inaugurated as Kansas State College's ninth president. Eisenhower, brother of General Dwight D. Eisenhower, accepted the position after Francis D. Farrell resigned because he said the school needed "a young and vigorous president during wartime." The 1945 Royal Purple described Eisenhower as "a friend to the students and faculty members alike." He was one of the most influential leaders in ushering in a new period of growth and development at Kansas State College.

Academics

In 1942, what previously were known as "divisions" of graduate work — agriculture, engineering and architecture, home economics and veterinary medicine — became known as "schools." During the same period, the Division of General Sciences became the School of Arts and Sciences.

In 1944, KSC had its first mid-year commencement in order to graduate seniors before they left to assist in the war effort. In the time leading up to the war and after it ended, most programs at K-State also became accelerated to grant degrees more quickly.

The first television station in Kansas was located at K-State in 1948.

Campus activities

One-third of students were entirely self-supporting in the early 1940s, and another one-third earned part of their expenses through part-time jobs, such as ditch digging, office work and janitorial work.

"The most coveted honor of a K-State coed was to be elected Royal Purple Beauty Queen," according to the 1941 Royal Purple. Girls from sororities and living communities would be nominated and their pictures would be sent to Hollywood to be judged by a celebrity.

The first female student body president, Ethelinda Parrish, was elected in 1944. Both the Collegian and The K-State Engineer had female editors for the first time in 1945.

Housing reached crisis limits throughout the 1940s. Until 1949, Van Zile Hall was the only residence hall on campus.

Apartment buildings in Manhattan were converted to temporary living organizations and four fraternities also were converted into women's dorms.

Many other independent living organizations were created throughout the city for men and women because of the lack of space on campus. Trailers and barracks were erected after World War II for married veterans because of the boom in enrollment.

The student council did away with the "no smoking" tradition and all rules associated with it in 1944.

Campus Improvements

Willard Hall opened in 1940, easing the space limitations caused by the Denison Hall fire in 1934. The new building offered a separate annex for chemical engineering and mathematics.

In 1944, the Military Science Building was completed, providing more training for those heading to Europe to fight in World War II.

The K-State Student Union slowly was becoming a reality in the late 1940s. The Royal Purple described it as having "air-conditioning and being designed for lounging, entertainment, sports, organizational meetings, dances and student publications." A temporary Union was created in 1948.

1940-1949

The 1940's brought about many changes to Varney's. Ted Varney was called to active duty in the U. S. Army from 1940-45, serving in North Africa and Italy, and attaining the rank of Lt. Colonel. After the war, the G.I. Bill allowed many veterans to attend K-State. Varney's College Book Store did their best to handle the increased volume of customers–along with the mountain of government paperwork!

Buchanan's decision could kill GOP hopes

Pat Buchanan is killing the Republican Party softly with his song. Not that he hasn't tried in the past — his harsh melodies have been at odds with the party for a long time. His views, far to the right of center, hurt the party when he was a member because people mistook them for the views of the entire party.

Now that he's leaving, however, he will continue to damage the party even more. He is aligning himself these days with Ross Perot's Reform Party, which spells trouble for Republicans.

In all likelihood, Ross Perot denied George Bush the presidency in 1992 by running on the Reform Party ticket. Perot did this by splitting the conservative vote. For that reason, President Clinton was elected by less than a majority of voters.

Buchanan potentially could do the same thing and deny another Republican the presidency by running on an independent ticket. If he wins the Reform Party nomination, conservative Republicans likely will vote for him, while moderate Republicans probably will vote for the Republican nominee. In that scenario, the Democratic nominee probably wins by default without a majority of the votes.

There is no guarantee Buchanan will win the Reform Party nomination, especially since no one knows what the party stands for. That would be difficult for outsiders to know, since it's apparent the Reform Party members don't know themselves. Right now, the party's most famous, including Donald Trump, Buchanan and Minnesota Gov. Jesse Ventura, stand at odds on many of the issues.

The tragedy in Buchanan's switch is that for the most part, Buchanan's views aren't at odds with the Republican Party. He never will be elected to the nation's highest office, so all this latest move does is help ensure someone with views further from his own a better chance at the office.

What exactly is Project Wellness' goal with all these ads, and where are they getting the money to pay for them?

I was just wondering what kind of society we live in when disc jockeys from the campus radio station have to follow a script.

Here's a great news flash: pedestrians have the right of way. That's the law.

I would like to personally thank whoever stole my bike. You forgot to steal my wife's bike, though, so please come back and get it.

Is it just me or is Bob Dole incredibly funny? I just loved it when he made fun of Monica Lewinsky.

I'm tired of the Project Wellness. Most students can't go out without having at least five drinks.

To the person who ran through the red light and nearly took off the front end of my truck, it's people like you that make our insurance rates so high. Pay attention.

Before you insult someone, walk a mile in their Homecoming jacket.

I just wanted to say that I'm really glad Bob Dole was here yesterday. It's the first decent guy I've seen on campus all year.

If the paper wants to encourage Homecoming spirit, they should stop putting those people that practice it down. Hypocrites.

How can you tell it's Homecoming? All the independents are complaining about the greeks dressing alike.

I would just like to thank the Collegian for the great editorial on the Wonderful World of Oz. I live in Olathe, and I don't want to see a rundown amusement park in three years.

RUDENESS is a VIRTUE

ADAM HAYES/COLLEGIAN

Beyond universally rude actions like farting, rudeness lies in eye of beholder

BRANDI HERTIG

Rudeness is situational, I suppose. Some things are universally rude, like sitting on someone's head and farting. Then there are some things that some construe as rude while others don't see it as such — like being blunt. Is there a difference between rudeness and boldness? Ah, a rhetorical question. Perhaps that was rude of me.

John, when he was an undergraduate at K-State, sometimes would walk directly through ROTC formations as cadets practiced in the grassy area across from Military Science Hall. This would make them angry, to which John would reply with a kiss on the lips.

Now, as a graduate student in physical chemistry at the University of Wisconsin, John regularly has it out with his professors about their methods of explanation and other things about chemistry and theories my mind will never understand. He is a brilliant guy, to be sure, and not very shy.

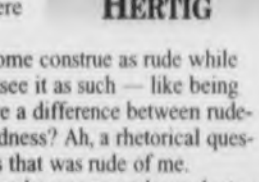
We were sitting in the museum under the St. Louis Arch this weekend. When I was ready to go, he said, "It may be a while. Ass problem." When I inquired whose ass was in question, he nodded his head to the woman sitting next to him. Part of the sleeve of his jacket was wedged tightly under said woman's right butt cheek. Rather than pulling it out or even asking the woman to please lift her butt, John was content just to sit there and wait for her to move. "I shouldn't have been taking up two seats," he said.

I decided to take some initiative and reached behind him to yank the sleeve from underneath the offending butt. The woman seemed nonplused, though she did glance our way.

"That was rude," John said to me later.

It's an interesting paradox, the way he operates. The same man who unabashedly will tell jokes involving 5-year-olds and bloody clown suits will also say things like, "I don't think the car horn should be used as an expression of anger."

Then there's me, and the way I operate. While I would never kiss intimidating members of the same sex or argue vehemently with my professors, I have no problem yanking things from under butts or using my car horn (and a particular finger) to express anger. While I tend to deviate from the general population on most issues, I think I'm in the majority on this one.



John said later that "rude" wasn't the word he wanted to use, but he never said what word he intended. Maybe the woman found it rude that I pulled John's jacket from under her butt, but more likely she felt embarrassed about sitting on it to begin with. I am positive she did not give the situation more thought than that. As for John and me, it was a topic of discussion periodically throughout the weekend.

Now that I've written this fine piece of journalism, I'm sure it'll come up at least one more time.

Rudeness is in the eye of the beholder, and most delicate situations walk a fine line. But who gets to define what's rude and what is not, the person on the receiving end of things or the person doing the action?

Congressman explains finanicial perspective from Washington, D.C.

DENNIS MOORE

During the months I've been in Congress, I learned one thing right away. They don't count money in Washington, D.C. like we do here in Kansas. In January, everyone was talking about the "surplus" and what to do with it. But in truth, the only surplus was a surplus of Social Security revenue. So I introduced a bill to require government to tell the truth about Social Security and the deficit. The House passed the Social Security lockbox, which used language from my proposal.

Much later, everyone is still arguing about the "surplus" and how much to increase spending or cut taxes. The fact is this money is still only a projection that assumes a continued strong economy, no recessions and adherence to the budget caps.

I look at this whole issue from the perspective of a family. For example, take Jim and Barbara, who have two children, pay a $115,000 mortgage at 8 percent, and have an $8,000 credit-card debt at 18-percent interest. Jim's boss told him last week that he might get a $5,000 bonus in January. Jim's first impulse was to say, "Good, I want to take Barbara on a cruise." But what should Jim be doing? Going on a cruise or paying down his credit-card debt?

We all know the financially responsible course of action.

We've been told about a possible bonus in the form of a projected surplus, which might materialize over the next decade if the economy remains strong. The question is whether we opt for immediate gratification with a tax cut or increased spending, or instead, use surpluses to pay down the $5.6 trillion national debt. Shall we put our nation's financial house in order? Or do we take the money and run, leaving the debt to our children and grandchildren?

Back in July, Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan told the House Banking Committee that his preference would be to spend surpluses — if they actually develop — on paying down debt. I took what he said to heart and voted for a proposal that would devote 50 percent of projected surpluses to debt reduction, 25 percent to preserving and protecting Social Security and Medicare and 25 percent to tax relief. Yes, the recommendation I voted for would do this if, and only if, the surplus becomes a reality.

Why do Alan Greenspan and other economists believe paying down the debt is preferable to spending or tax cuts?

In February, I met with the Chairman of the Kansas City Federal Reserve and one of his economists. I asked that very question. The economist said that if we were to pay down the public debt, we might expect a dramatic drop in interest rates, as much as 2-3 percent. As an example of what this means to consumers, dropping Jim and Barbara's 30-year mortgage by 2 percent would save them more than $1,850 per year.

This kind of savings would be available to every person who borrows money to buy a car, a home or for an education or business loan. This would be the ultimate tax cut.

Last year, we paid $243 billion in interest on the national debt. Paying down the debt also would decrease the annual interest payment and free funds for tax cuts.

It's time to get back to basics. In our personal lives we follow some common sense rules, which would work well for our country. We need to:

1. Pay our debts.
2. Don't spend money we don't have.
3. Provide for basic needs.

This should not be a partisan issue, and we should not let this opportunity pass. Our nation needs to be fiscally responsible and do the right thing now for the benefit of future generations. Throughout this debate, Congress needs to remember it's not their money they're talking about. With a $5.6 trillion national debt, it's our children's money and future that lie in the balance.

Ambassadors to be elected for next year

By Jamie Barrett
Kansas State Collegian

Four students will be competing this week to replace 1999 K-State Student Ambassadors Angela Moxley and Phil Stein.

The candidates for the ambassador positions are Suzie Goering, junior in agricultural economics and international studies; Erica Guries, sophomore in international business and marketing; Casey Clark, junior in biology and pre-med; and Ben Hemmen, junior in history and political science.

Voting takes place 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. today through Friday at the K-State Student Union, at which time students can place their vote for the 2000 female and male ambassadors.

Bernie Haney, assistant director of in-state programs for the KSU Alumni Association and chairman for the All-University Homecoming Committee, said the candidates for the ambassador positions were decided upon last week.

"All the candidates had to submit an application," Haney said. "They then went through two interviews done by both students and faculty."

Haney said the candidates were chosen because of their knowledge of the campus, good communication skills, positive image and ability to work with people.

The ambassador program began in 1977 when the Alumni Association decided there needed to be a student representative for the campus.

"The Homecoming king and queen competition diminished in 1972," Haney said. "In 1977, there was a need for some sort of a student representative with a positive influence."

Haney said ambassadors get the opportunity to work with the Alumni Association on many projects.

"The students that serve as ambassadors have great opportunities," Haney said.

Moxley, junior in general human ecology, said running for the ambassador position was one of the best things she has done at K-State.

"I think that being able to travel with the alumni and working with prospective students is the best part of being an ambassador," Moxley said.

Stein, junior in political science and pre-law, said being an ambassador made him realize some of his priorities.

Moxley said student ambassadors have some of the greatest opportunities to work with the Alumni Association and to develop leadership skills by working with perspective students.

"Helping new students and visiting with them about college is one of my favorite parts," Moxley said. "I would not trade that for anything."

Casey Clark

junior in biology and pre-medicine

Many people will see the new millennium as the end of an era. I see it more as a continuation and a beginning — a continuation of K-State's rise as the best university in the nation and the beginning of Wildcat domination.

Purple pride is sweeping the nation because of all the wonderful things happening right here in the Little Apple. Not many universities can claim such strong tradition or unconditional support of alumni and community. Not many can say they better humanity by first educating the brightest students and then by researching ways to a better life. Of course, not many other schools are on the same level as K-State.

Having lived in Manhattan for 14 years, I have been able to witness this rise to the top. With this experience in mind, I want to show everyone K-State is the best. K-State deserves the best students, and those students deserve K-State.

I want to give our alumni that tingling feeling down their spines when they hear that our volleyball, football and cross country teams all are ranked in the top 25 in the nation.

I want to give everyone the opportunity to feel as welcome and at home as we feel when walkin across our beautiful campus. I want the world to know how great K-State is right now.

K-State gives us the opportunity not only to become better students but to become better people — people who will make a great difference in this world. The university surrounds us with diversity in majors, organizations to become involved in and programming such as world-renowned speakers. These opportunities and distinctions help separate K-State from any other school. Our alumni know how great our university has been, and prospective students know how great K-State is right now, but one only can think of what K-State will accomplish in the future. I feel I am the right one to share and communicate this greatness to others and to help spring K-State into the new millennium. 1999 truly is Wildcat Time, but it is also the beginning of so much more.

Suzie Goering

junior in agricultural economics and international studies

Being a Wildcat is a tradition in my family. With both parents as well as many aunts and uncles as alumni, I received a large dose of purple pride as a young child. I heard so many wonderful stories about K-State that by the time my brother was leaving for college I was ready to skip seventh grade and head for Manhattan as well. Instead, I had to wait six more years before I officially could become a Wildcat.

As soon as I set foot on campus as a student, I knew immediately what everyone had been talking about.

K-State has so much to offer each and every one of its students. The outstanding facilities are evidence of the commitment that K-State has for providing an atmosphere that facilitates personal growth in addition to academic achievement.

The award-winning professors and advisers provide enriching university experience , engaging students in active learning and the pursuit of excellence. The student body itself is a tribute to the university. There is an extraordinary array of leaders and scholars from Kansas as well as the United States and the world.

Finally, K-State offers tradition — a tradition of academic excellence, competitive spirit and determination to succeed.

A Wildcat spirit that spans generations. It is the same purple pride that my parents experienced during their times in Manhattan and the same spirit that I hope to one day share with my children.

From my love for the campus, appreciation for the students and faculty and passion for purple pride comes my desire to share K-State with the rest of the world. I believe there is no greater way to serve an institution that has given me so much than by sharing my experiences with others so they might benefit as well.

Anyone who has ever graduated from K-State, attended school here or even visited for a day knows we have something special. For that reason, it would be both the greatest responsibility and the greatest honor for me to serve K-State as a student ambassador.

Erica Guries

sophomore in international business and marketing

I remember being a high school senior coming to K-State for a campus visit.

Of course, I was impressed by K-State's high standard of academic excellence, the various opportunities to get involved and the beautiful campus. But it was definitely the people who convinced me that K-State was where I wanted to be.

The friendly atmosphere and the smiling students who characterize our campus amaze me. It is such an exciting feeling to walk through the K-State Student Union or across campus and encounter so many friendly faces along the way. As a K-State ambassador, this is what I would most like to share with prospective students.

For me, K-State is more than just a renowned university. It is also an amazingly diverse community where students and faculty come from the largest metropolitan cities in the world and some of the smallest towns in Kansas. The array of opportunities here is as broad as the horizon on the Konza Prairie, yet the campus is small enough that people are not easily lost in the crowd.

I am convinced that K-State has something for everyone, both students and alumni alike. Whether it is a road trip to a bowl game, attending a nationally acclaimed Landon Lecture or catching a movie at the Union, there is always something exciting happening at K-State.

K-State is more than just a place where people come to go to school for four, five or even six years.

It is a place where they will remember cheering the Wildcats on to yet another victory and staying up all night to study for a final exam. It is here that they will make lifelong friends and come a little closer to discovering who they are.

As a K-State ambassador, I would love the opportunity to share with prospective students and alumni the wonderful opportunities, the diverse experiences and, of course, the remarkable pride and spirit that come from being a Wildcat!

Ben Hemmen

junior in history and political science

I was born in Lawrence. I grew up cheering for a tune other than the Wildcat March or the Wabash Cannonball. I looked at a lot of colleges and was set on going somewhere else along Interstate-70. Luckily, this all ended in April of my senior year in high school.

I was invited to K-State by a friend who wanted me to tag along and see what K-State had to offer. Once I stepped onto the K-State campus, I knew this was the school for me.

You could just feel the purple pride while walking around on campus. Every student walked with their heads up, saying "Hi" as you passed by. I could tell that all of the professors I met with that day cared 110 percent about the education I would get at K-State. There were more than 375 clubs and organizations to get involved with and great traditions of excellence in student government, greek affairs, student publications, residence hall programs and more at K-State.

Everything K-State has to offer on paper doesn't even come close to comparing K-State with other universities when it comes to personal touches.

At K-State, you aren't just another admissions number. I received more phone calls, personal notes and personalized purple signatures from students and faculty in one month than with all the other universities combined that I looked at in the past nine months. This personalized commitment to excellence is why I want to represent K-State as your student ambassador.

When I was growing up, my family lived all over the northeast part of Kansas — Lawrence, Stillwell, Hiawatha, Topeka, Kansas City and now Paola. It is this diverse lifestyle that has made it easy for me to communicate with students from both big and small towns as a summer orientation leader. I have followed K-State to every football game in the past two years, including the bowl games. I strongly believe people will find no other alumni base that follows and supports its alma mater like K-State.

There are many people who can do this job and do it well. I want to use my personal experiences while at K-State to help with recruitment, alumni relations and improving upon our commitment to excellence while we are at this great university. I almost made the mistake of going to a different university. I will not let this happen to anyone else.

Yours in Wildcat spirit and purple pride!

K-State volleyball team travels to Texas for rematch against No. 10 Texas Tech

BY ERICA COURTRIGHT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Cats have passed the halfway point.

The K-State women's volleyball team travels to Lubbock, Texas, today, to challenge the Texas Tech Red Raiders in the first match of the second half of K-State's conference schedule. The match is the second meeting of the teams this season.

On Sept. 25, the Cats downed the Red Raiders in straight games, 15-10, 15-8 and 15-1 in Manhattan. Texas Tech was led by middle blocker Colleen Smith, who recorded 14 kills, and setter Skydra Orzen, who put up 29 assists.

The Cats were paced by sophomore outside hitter Liz Wegner, who blasted 16 kills, and senior outside hitter Dawn Cady, who posted a double-double with 12 kills and 10 digs.

No. 15 K-State goes to Lubbock with a 15-3 record, sitting atop the Big 12, tied for the first-place spot with No. 10 Texas, which has an identical conference record of 9-1.

Both teams enter tonight's match coming off conference victories over the weekend. Texas Tech downed Missouri in straight games while the Cats defeated Baylor in four games.

K-State has a 7-4 advantage over Texas Tech in the all-time series record, having won five of the past seven meetings since the Big 12 conference was formed.

Tonight's matchup features the Big 12's two tallest players in Texas Tech's 6-foot-6-inch Smith and K-State's sophomore middle blocker Jayne Christen, who measures in at 6 feet five inches.

Following tonight's match, the Cats return home to take on No. 13 Nebraska in Conference action Saturday.

Crew team turns in strong showing

■ Women's varsity squad finishes 28th of 64 at regatta in Boston.

BY ERICA COURTRIGHT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Wildcats turned in a strong showing in Boston, but not strong enough.

K-State women's crew finished 28th in a 64-boat field at the Head of the Charles Regatta in Boston over the weekend.

The first varsity eight, the Cats' lone entry, turned in a time of 18:22.09, behind 27th place Williams College Rowing Association, which finished in a time of 18:16.04.

Rowing Canada out of Ontario won the Women's Championship Eights title with a time of 16:31.41. The University of Kansas entry finished in a time of 18:08.45, good for 24th place.

Head coach Jenny Hale said the athletes had a strong performance but said there is still room for improvement. She said that she wasn't pleased with a 28th place finish, and that she would have liked to have finished in the top 20.

Junior Heather Megnia said her boat's finish was disappointing, because she and her teammates thought they had finished higher.

"I think we were real excited when we got off the water," she said, "except for some little things. We felt like we raced good, and we were a little surprised that we were 28th place. It was disappointing."

Megnia said her team lost focus at the end of the race. Also, she said they had problems with rushing the slide, rowing a bit uncontrolled at times.

"We're trying to figure out technique things," she said.

Megnia also said only 25 seconds separated K-State in 28th place and the University of Iowa in 15th.

Conditions were cold at the start of the race with small wind gusts throughout, Megnia said, but weather was not much of a factor.

The Head of the Charles Regatta is one of the largest single regattas in the world. It attracts world renowned scullers, including Marnie McBean of Canada, who is a three-time Olympic gold medalist and a three-time World Championships gold medalist.

K-State returns to racing action in Iowa City, Iowa, on Sunday at the Head of the Iowa Regatta. The Cats will send a full team to the event, including four pair entries.

"We are working on making up the 25 seconds on Iowa," Megnia said.

Men's soccer club finishes 3rd in home tournament

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State men's club soccer placed third this weekend in the 21st-annual KSU-Ed Chartrand Memorial Soccer Tournament at the Frank Anneberg Recreational Complex.

The Wildcats won all three of their first-round games to advance to the semifinals Saturday, where the Wildcats lost a tough contest against Oklahoma State, 4-2.

K-State's loss was disappointing, considering the Wildcats already had beat the Cowboys earlier that same day, winning 2-0 in K-State's final game of the first round.

The Cowboys were the eventual tournament runners-up, losing 4-0 to the University of Kansas in the championship. It was the Jayhawks' second consecutive tournament championship.

K-State won its opening game Friday evening, 8-0, against Highland Community College and then went on to defeat Northwest Missouri State 1-0 Saturday morning.

In addition, the K-State women's club soccer team played an exhibition game against the Jayhawk women Friday.

The Jayhawks defeated the Wildcats, 5-1, in the feature match.

Eric Glover, senior club president and team captain, received the 1999 Ed Chartrand Memorial Soccer Scholarship.

This is the second consecutive year Glover has been awarded this prestigious honor.

The $500 scholarship is presented each year to a K-State soccer player and is funded by private donations as well as donations by the Chartrand family of Leawood, Kan.

The Ed Chartrand Memorial has contributed more than $100,000 to the sports development at K-State over the past 20 years.

Dreaded strength of schedule again Wildcats' downfall in BCS standings

Just one day after the first ABC Sports Bowl Championship Series poll was released this season, the questions already have started.

One thing that comes to mind is whether the whole system really works. Last year, in the first-annual ranking system to determine a true national championship game, the BCS came close to failing, and failing miserably.

Going into the conference championship weekend, there were three undefeated teams, something that would defeat the purpose of matching the two undefeated teams in the national championship showdown. It looked as if someone would be the one out of a national championship game picture.

But as we all know, K-State and UCLA both lost their conference championship games, and Tennessee was left as the lone undefeated team. The Volunteers played Florida State, which had lost one game earlier in the season. Despite being ranked No. 3 in the final BCS standings, the Wildcats were left to play in the Builders Square Alamo Bowl.

As avid criticism surrounds the BCS, head coach Bill Snyder reminded everyone that K-State did, in fact, lose their chance to play for the title with the loss to Texas A&M last season.

"And even though it might have been close to the wire, that's exactly the way it played out," Snyder said, "and we just weren't good enough when the time came in order to put ourselves in the position to let the BCS play out and give us a chance a national championship. It was our own doing. We understood that."

This year, K-State is sitting at No. 5 and could be pinned into another controversial ending. Florida State, Penn State, Virginia Tech and K-State all are undefeated, but 6-1 Tennessee is still in front of the Cats.

Once again, the aspect of the BCS that continues to hurt the Cats is the dreaded strength of schedule. Through K-State's seven games this season, they sit 43rd nationally in schedule toughness. The BCS' No. 3 team, Virginia Tech, a team that posts the nation's 42nd-hardest schedule, is still in the running as well.

According to Jon Litner, senior vice president of programming for ABC Sports; Roy Kramer, commissioner of the Southeastern Conference and BCS coordinator; and Terry Bowden, ABC Sports college football studio analyst; the BCS' decision to use the schedule strength as a deciding factor is to encourage college football programs to establish harder schedules to move up in their poll.

"A football program that looks at where they want to be at the end of the season, to be a contender for the No. 1 or 2 spot or the BCS rankings, they're going to take that into consideration two or three years ahead and schedule accordingly," Bowden said.

"Maybe a team that's just a game to pick up a winning program may have no interest, and they may schedule to get more victories and have the right to do that to make a bowl of some type. I think what I would say is, it now at least has the awareness of coaches and athletic directors around the country depending on where they want to be with their program and what they want to have opportunities to do."

Kramer said the incentive to schedule tougher opponents is that — if they win out — they'll have the chance to play for the whole bag of marbles.

"If you don't get there either as the one or two, you won't have the opportunity to play for the national championship," Kramer said. "That's obviously the incentive."

Head coach Bill Snyder does not agree. He said he will do what is best for his program, and that is all that counts.

"My feeling about our schedule is that I want to do what I feel is very best for our football team year in and year out," Snyder said. "I can't tell you that it ends up exactly that way, but that's what the attempt is.

"I think that when I say this is based on a year-in-year-out deal, what I think is best for 1999 football team might not be the same for the 2000 team or the 2001, or the 1998, or 1997. So it changes year in and year out."

Snyder did, on the other hand, say scheduling in that manner is tough to do sometimes.

"It is tough, and that's why we don't always schedule very far in advance at all, and sometimes that can backfire on you.

"I think then, the menu becomes more reduced the longer you wait."

That did hurt the Cats last season because they played Northeast Louisiana, a Division 1-A independent, a team K-State blasted 62-7 at KSU Stadium.

K-State's start is far from what people envisioned. Many publications had the Cats ranked in the lower stage of the nation, and some polls even had K-State unranked while predicting a dismal record of 6-5. The Cats have set themselves up for yet another run at the title — Nebraska still remains on their schedule — and as a far as Snyder is concerned, it is all in K-State's hands.

"All we can do is take care of what Kansas State can do," Snyder said. "We can't be concerned with the BCS thinks or how the polls are or how other people are doing."

For Snyder, who has always been in favor of the poll system, his opinion has apparently changed with the inception of the BCS.

"My feeling right now is that I'm no longer opposed with a playoff," Snyder said. "I don't have the answer.

"How good is the BCS system or how bad is it? I don't know. Obviously, I wasn't concerned with it a year ago and I don't think it's changed."

From 3rd string to heroism, Hall and Williams show their skills

You can call them rookies, and you can call them novices, just don't call them third-stringers anymore, because the third string just got promoted.

George Williams and Joe Hall aren't just backups anymore.

After weeks of obscurity, these two community college transfers have started to fill gaps in a struggling Wildcat offense.

Now the only time you can use "Joe Hall" and "backup" in the same sentence is if you say, "Joe Hall just ran right through that defender, and the defender can't get back up."

Williams isn't likely to see the bench anytime soon, either.

You see, until a few weeks ago, Hall and Williams were just spots on the roster and prospects for playing time down the road. Oh, how times have changed.

With injuries to Frank Murphy and David Allen, the running back position was left empty. That was when Hall stepped up and stepped out against Utah State carrying the ball and defenders for 195 yards and two touchdowns.

Against Oklahoma State, Williams had his own coming out party. Injuries sidelined Martez Wesley and Brandon Clark, allowing Williams a chance at playing time. Williams turned that chance into 146 yards and a touchdown on the receiving end of Jonathan Beasley's brightest game. Not bad for a guy who entered the game with one reception for 12 yards. Williams provided the spark that ignited the Cowboy secondary and spurred the Wildcats to another come-from-behind road victory.

The future looks bright for both players.

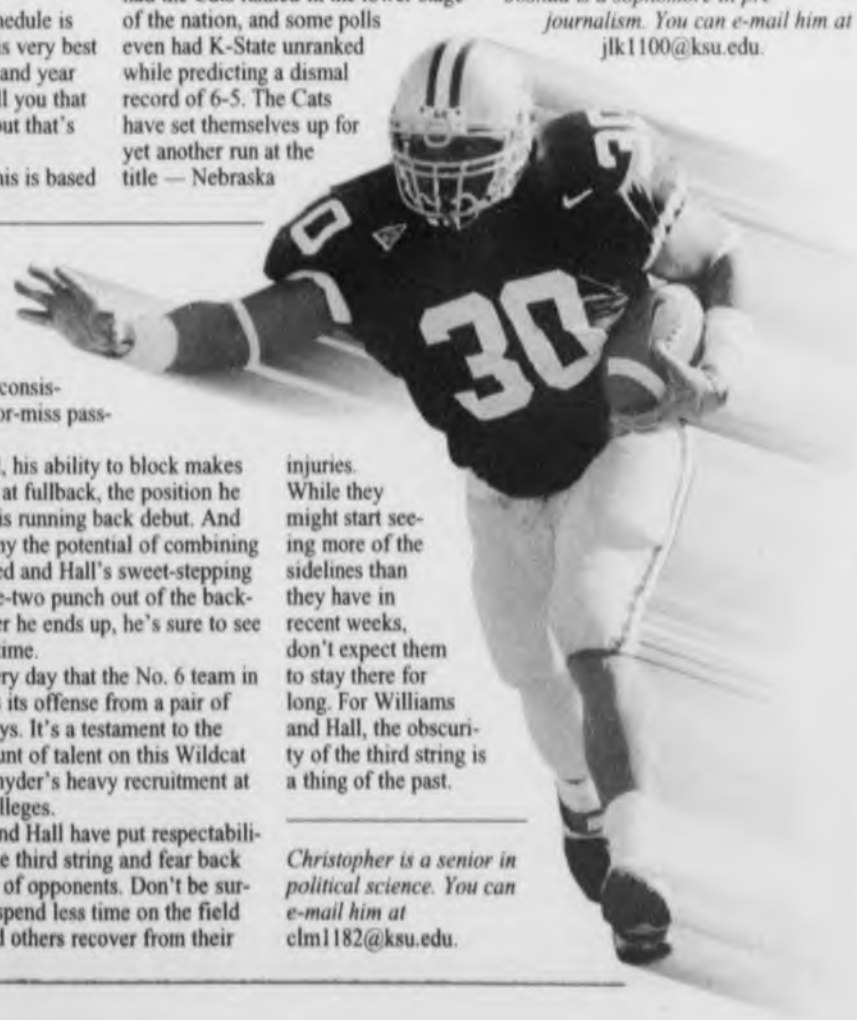
Already Hall has attracted local and national attention and has captured every nickname from "Gravy Train" to Joe "U" Hall to Joe "in for the Long" Hall. It seems the media just can't get enough of the only 300-pound running back in Division I football.

Williams received nothing but praise from coaches on both sides of the ball after his stellar performance on Saturday.

So what will Hall and Williams do now that they've had their chances? You can bet that they won't give it back without a fight. Hall has already made it clear that he intends to battle Murphy for the starting spot. That's no disrespect for Murphy, it's just a show of the determination that Hall is known for.

Williams won't be a pushover, either.

The coaches knew it was just a matter of time before Williams caught on. It was clear to everyone on the team that Williams was no joke. He just needed to learn the plays a little better and get some experience under his belt.



With injuries to several players, Williams might be the key to adding consistency to a hit-or-miss passing game.

As for Hall, his ability to block makes him a weapon at fullback, the position he filled before his running back debut. And no one can deny the potential of combining Murphy's speed and Hall's sweet-stepping power as a one-two punch out of the backfield. Wherever he ends up, he's sure to see more playing time.

It's not every day that the No. 6 team in the nation gets its offense from a pair of third-string guys. It's a testament to the immense amount of talent on this Wildcat team and to Snyder's heavy recruitment at community colleges.

Williams and Hall have put respectability back into the third string and fear back into the hearts of opponents. Don't be surprised if they spend less time on the field as Murphy and others recover from their injuries. While they might start seeing more of the sidelines than they have in recent weeks, don't expect them to stay there for long. For Williams and Hall, the obscurity of the third string is a thing of the past.

Author says schools should teach science based on fact, not nonsense

JEFF COOPER/COLLEGIAN

Lawrence Krauss speaks in Weber Hall on Tuesday afternoon during his multimedia presentation "Nonsense, Non-Science, and Science: From Aliens to Creationism." Nonsense books and videos, Krauss said, also contribute to people not being able to distinguish between science and non-science.

BY JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The biggest danger to classrooms is creating controversy where there really is none, Lawrence Krauss said Tuesday during his multimedia presentation, "Nonsense, Non-Science, and Science: From Aliens to Creationism."

The presentation was sponsored by the departments of Physics and Biology.

Krauss, professor of physics and astronomy and chair of the Department of Physics at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, spoke about the importance of distinguishing science from non-science.

He said no person is an authority in science. The only authority in science is experimentation.

"Unless you can measure it and falsify it, it's not science," he said. "If we can't falsify science, we shouldn't be talking about it."

Krauss, who has written many popular science books, including "The Physics of Star Trek" and "Beyond Star Trek," stressed the importance of keeping non-science, such as the theory of creationism, out of the classroom.

One of the problems with creationism, he said, is that people make literal interpretations of the Bible. He stated astronomer Galileo Galilei's opinion that if people take the Bible literally, they will err.

"That which is falsified is nonsense, so you cannot literally take interpretations from the Bible," he said.

He gave examples of false literal interpretations of the Bible, such as a Bible verse that states the Earth is fixed. The Bible also gives a description and dimensions of a molten basin that implies pi is equal to three.

"Literal interpretations of statements from the Bible are nonsense," he said. "Undeniably, pi is not three."

He said there should be no debate about creationism because the Earth is not just 6,000 years old, as the theory suggests.

"Since the Earth is not 6,000 years old, creationism is not science, and it shouldn't be taught that way," he said.

He said keeping topics such as evolution and the big-bang theory out of classrooms and replacing them with non-science is keeping students from being prepared for careers in the field of science. He said the restrictions some states are placing on science classes are not fair to the students.

"What offends me more is the bad science, because it's doing students a bad service," he said.

Krauss talked about other popular nonsense theories and how they should not be considered controversial. He talked about the misconception of crop circles being created by aliens. He said the media continue to confuse people into believing the circles are made by aliens, when in fact two men have confessed to making the circles as a hoax.

He said there are numerous problems with UFO sightings. People believe they see UFOs because the aircraft aren't behaving like normal aircraft or space craft would. One of the characteristic moves of UFOs is that they move at sharp right angles faster than the speed of light.

This description should mean the craft is not alien-made or human-made.

"Right angles in the sky are not healthy. You would experience 700 times the force of gravity," he said. "Most planes don't look too good after that."

He also said flying saucer sightings describe the saucers moving easily in the Earth's atmosphere. But outside the Earth's atmosphere, the saucer would be out of control, and no aliens would go to that much trouble just to fly around Earth.

"Almost any other explanation is better than the explanation that aliens are coming to visit us," he said.

When it comes to miracles, he said, the easiest person to fool is oneself. He said coincidences can be easy to believe, such as a statue of the Virgin Mary having healing powers. He said actual chances of being cured by the statue are about one in a million.

He said much of the problem with people believing non-science is that journalists who lack science backgrounds are afraid to ask questions about different theories presented in the media. He said although journalists are trained to present both sides of an issue, with science there is often only one side.

"Many journalists are simply uncomfortable with science," he said.

He said it is important in grade schools and high schools to mention theories against evolution in order to teach students that science works by proving theories false. But he said it is also important to focus on the best theory and not dwell on all of them.

"It's important to help kids understand the best picture that we have of the world," he said.

City Commission recommends modifications to intersection improvements

BY TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Improvements to the intersection of Fort Riley Boulevard and Seth Child Road are tentatively scheduled to begin in April 2004.

City commissioners recommended project modifications to the Kansas Department of Transportation at a policy session meeting Tuesday. Monty Prescott, corporate secretary for BG Consultants, said the 20 mph curve to exit east-bound Fort Riley onto Seth Child will be safer.

Five lanes will replace the existing two lanes under the bridge at the intersection.

Corky Armstrong, road design leader for KDOT, said the Seth Child exit to east-bound Fort Riley also will be signalized, although traffic counts do not warrant signals at the north-bound ramp terminal.

"It could be in 10 or 15 years you could meet the criteria for signals, and we would set it up where those could be installed," he said.

Accident rates for the intersection are below state averages. Armstrong said a traffic death in 1997 pushed the fatality rate above the average.

Armstrong said KDOT needs the commissioner's plans for the project by May 2000 to remain on schedule.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said he needed additional current data for the project before providing a response. He said he is not confident that safety concerns exist at the intersection.

"I just wonder if what we are doing will really make a significant improvement to warrant the level of investment we are talking about," he said.

K-State student travels to Kentucky to compete in FFA competition

BY RHONDA NIDA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hard work, dedication and a love for people and agriculture have placed Michael Springer in contention for the highest award in the National FFA organization.

SPRINGER

Springer, senior in agricultural economics, is a finalist for the Star Farmer of America award. As one of four finalists, he is representing the state of Kansas, the K-State Collefe of Agriculture, and the Neodesha, Kan., FFA chapter at the 72nd National FFA Convention today through Saturday in Louisville, Ky.

Springer said recognition is not the reason he strives to be successful in FFA. Instead, he said his goal is to become a better farmer and businessman in his community.

"It doesn't matter to me if I get the big award or not," he said. "It would be neat, but it is not a big deal to me. I didn't do all of this for an award. That's not good business. What's neat about this award is that it recognizes my life."

The award recognizes the top-four programs nationally in production agriculture. A member of FFA for eight years, Springer's farming operation has four areas, including a bottle-calf herd, crop production, a farrow-to-finish sow herd and leadership development activities.

With strong family support from parents and a sister, as well as good advice from his high school agricultural education teacher and FFA adviser, Larry Gossen, Springer said he has been able to invest in his operation by purchasing livestock, equipment and land since his program began.

Springer said he recalls his greatest moment in his FFA career as serving as the 1996-97 State FFA Treasurer.

"The highlight of my career was being a state officer," he said. "I was able to interact with a lot of neat people. Not only did I help other people grow and accomplish their goals, but I grew myself. It was a lot of hard work, but it was worth every minute of it."

Gossen, Neodesha FFA adviser, worked with Springer to prepare his 20-page application for American Star Farmer. He said Springer helped put the Neodesha FFA chapter on the map and left a standard for other students to follow.

"Michael was so very active in FFA in high school," Gossen said. "Probably the proudest moment I can recall with Michael was standing on the stage in McCain Auditorium at the 1996 State FFA Convention when he was named the Star Farmer of Kansas. There were six other finalists on stage with him. As they read off the name of the winner, I thought Michael was going to have a heart attack from excitement as they ushered him to the winner's stand. Then, just a few minutes later came the announcement of the new state FFA officers. When his name was called as the new treasurer, he exploded onto the stage with such excitement I thought he was going to run over anybody who got in his way. Both of these accomplishments were the culmination of four years of hard work and determination."

Springer said he attributes his success to the strong support of his parents and sister as well.

"My folks have been a big contributing factor," Springer said. "This isn't my award. Every bit of this, my family has helped me accomplish. FFA has probably brought us a lot closer together. It has brought us through some things as a family, vs. what we would have done normally. It means a lot to all of us."

"This isn't my award. Every bit of this, my family has helped me accomplish."

— Michael Springer, Star Farmer of America finalist

Fellow FFA members and K-State students also are aware of Springer's achievement with his farming operation. Abra Ungeheuer, senior in agricultural economics, said Springer gave a tour of his operation to the 1996-97 state FFA officer team and state staff member. She said she can remember being in awe of the program he had created.

"To think that someone so young could have worked so hard to establish what we were seeing was amazing to me," she said. "He has done a great job of learning from his father and grandfather, who he also farms with. Instead of allowing them to do most of the work, he has jumped in and helped the farm operation grow and expand as well."

Many people don't realize the skills farmers possess, Ungeheuer said. She said Springer has many responsibilities in order to run an operation of this scope, and he has done an excellent job keeping records for his Supervised Agricultural Experience. Those record-keeping skills are part of what has led Springer to achieving a place in the top four Star Farmers of America competition, Ungeheuer said.

"Michael has proven himself as a leader, listener, hard worker, bookkeeper and businessman," she said. "By mastering each of these skills, he has proven that he can handle the responsibilities his operations demand. Finally, I know that Michael is sincere in his effort to become the Star Farmer of America. Sometimes people pursue goals for the wrong reasons. Michael is usually chasing only the dreams of his heart."

In addition to being recognized on the convention stage Thursday evening, the finalists and their parents will receive a tour of an agricultural company today in the Louisville, Ky., area. Also on Thursday, Springer and his family will attend a breakfast sponsored by Butler Manufacturing, and then go through an interview process during the afternoon.

After the Stars Over America pageant, the finalists are required to attend the FFA Career Show and speak to other members across the nation about their programs.

The finalists receive a $1,000 cash award, a plaque and a trip to Costa Rica on the FFA International Exchange Trip. Springer said the program is designed to recognize the top four in the nation, and the winner of the Star Farmer of America award receives an additional $1,000 cash award, plaque and the opportunity to interview with various radio and TV stations. He also said the four finalists were all from the central region of the United States this year.

The finalists receive a $1,000 cash award, a plaque and a trip to Costa Rica. The winner of the Star Farmer of America Award receives an additional $1,000 cash award, plaque and the opportunity to interview with various radio and TV stations.

"It shows where the strength lies in the program," Springer said. "It is real common for the central region to do well in production agriculture."

In reflection of his FFA career during the past eight years, Springer said he has acquired a lot of recognition, but that is not how he defines being successful.

"It has been exciting," he said. "It has been a time of growth, a time of struggle and a time of success. Success to me is the opportunity to work with other people and enjoy activities. I have a lot of hardware on the wall to commemorate it, but that was not the purpose. The FFA organization helps people find a knack for a particular trait and build on it.

"As a freshman I was very scared at first, then I gained self-confidence. FFA has a large scope, and offers something for everyone. I recommend to younger members to try everything, find something they are good at and be successful."

Gossen said he is extremely proud of Springer's accomplishments, not only in receiving this award, but with his activities at K-State, the College of Agriculture and Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity. He also said Springer will have a special place in his memory.

"I will be glad when he returns home to the family farm so we can utilize his leadership skills in the community, and helping us get our FFA alumni chapter back on track," Gossen said. "Michael is an extremely motivated person. Anything he does, he does to the absolute best of his ability. He sets lofty goals for himself and then works his tail off to achieve them. He also has a heart for the FFA. He enjoys helping others and takes great pride in watching them succeed."

transforming TRADITION

STORY BY SHANNON DELMEZ

Halloween boasts storied history

The leaves are turning colors. The air is beginning to become cooler and the days, shorter. Children in the Manhattan area are anxiously awaiting the night when they can stay up late to see if the ghosts and goblins really do come out.

This only can mean that Halloween is just around the corner.

Oct. 31 has now become a night for children to dress up in various costumes, go around the neighborhood and collect candy, shouting the phrase, "Trick or treat!"

But where did this tradition come from?

Halloween can be traced back to the time when Christianity first came to Europe. Halloween included the customs and traditions of the existing Celtic culture, as well as the emerging Christian culture.

The Celtic culture celebrated the end of summer and the coming of winter, the time of death to crops. This time was called Samhain, which meant "summer's end." The pagans also thought this was the beginning of the period when the dead roamed the earth, according to the Web site www.almostradio.com/earthsongs/ancient.htm.

"Different cultures had different ways of celebrating that, but they all basically celebrated the coming of death," said Father Keith Weber of St. Isadore's Catholic Student Center.

At the beginning of the celebration of the time of death, pagan people often would tell stories about their dead ancestors coming back to roam the Earth, Weber said.

Then Christianity came to Europe, changing ideas of what the holiday meant.

"We already had a great respect for the dead and knowing that the dead are with God in heaven," Weber said. "We need to honor them and celebrate their life and the inspiration that they are to us. Because the cultures already had this time where they were scared of the dead, Christianity tried to turn that into a more positive influence."

The Christian holiday that celebrates the life of those who are now dead is the feast of All Saints, celebrated Nov. 1. Weber said all those who are dead are saints, and this holiday celebrates all the saints, not just the famous ones.

"We celebrate the life of those who are dead to remind us of how important those people are in our lives," Weber said.

The night before All Saints Day became known as All Holy Eve or All Hallows Eve, which became Halloween.

So where do all the symbols of black cats and witches come into play?

During the time of burning witches, cats were seen as "familiars" to witches and burned along with them. Black cats were seen to be even worse than cats of other colors, because black was seen as the color of evil, according to www.almostradio.com.

Pagans used the iron cauldron for cooking, washing clothes and heating water to bathe. When Christianity came to Europe and tried to replace existing pagan beliefs, the cauldron was said to be used to brew evil potions, and an evil connotation was given to it.

The jack-o'-lantern is an American custom that came from a Celtic tradition of carrying hollowed vegetables as candle holders or lanterns.

There are several theories as to the origins of trick-or-treating. One such theory is discussed in "The American Book of Days" by Jane Hatch. This theory suggests that it comes from an All Saints' Day tradition in England where men went around begging for soul cakes, a dessert of the holiday, in remembrance of the dead. The beggars promised extra prayers for the dead relatives of those who donated the soul cakes.

Another theory says trick-or-treating comes from the tradition of offering food for the spirits of the dead, according to www.almostradio.com. Wearing costumes is said to have come from the desire to disguise oneself from evil spirits, but this, too, has several variations.

These customs and traditions that were once so serious and connected to religion now have become a fun holiday for children. Yet, this fun holiday can still hold dangers for young trick-or-treaters.

Sgt. Stanley Conkwright of the Riley County Police Department had many suggestions to those wanting to welcome trick-or-treaters this Halloween.

"The big worry is toward safety for kids who are out trick-or-treating," he said. "We don't want to end up seeing candy tampered with, or somebody getting hurt."

Conkwright said the police department discourages handing out homemade goods to trick-or-treaters, and those handing out store-bought treats should make sure they are sealed by the company. Conkwright also said he suggests turning porch lights on and to make sure pets are locked away from trick-or-treaters. Many animals can be frightened by children in strange costumes.

"I think the big thing is, is let's look at this as a time for what it's supposed to be," Conkwright said. "It's supposed to be a fun time for everybody, and let's keep it that way."

Weber also said Halloween is supposed to be a fun time for children.

"As long as it's just something that is a children's plaything, there isn't much harm being done," he said.

Pumpkin Tips

STORY BY SARA MARTIN

- Cut a six-sided angled lid for the pumpkin so it doesn't fall in when it shrinks.
- Cut a chimney hole in the back side of the top to release smoke.
- Scrape the inside walls to less than 1 inch to make carving easier.
- Use a flat-ended ice cream scoop to scrape out the insides.
- Kitchen knives are fine for basic patterns, but miniature saws, found where most pumpkins are sold, work better for intricate patterns and details.
- Draw a pattern first, then tape it to the pumpkin and poke holes around the design.
- Rub flour in the holes to see them better.
- Don't burn candles too long. It makes the pumpkin shrivel faster.

Keep the pumpkin in the refrigerator when not burning the candle. It will last much longer.

If the pumpkin shrivels, soak it in water over night to restore it to its original size.

Manhattan businesses prepare for last-minute pumpkin rush

STORY BY SARA MARTIN

Imagine trying to carve two eyes, a nose and a mouth into a vegetable the size of a fist. It was probably no easy task, but the original tradition of carving a turnip was worth the effort.

When the practice began, the flickering candlelight inside brought life to the spooky-faced carvings that were set in front of houses to scare evil spirits away. Today, jack-o-lanterns bring Halloween spirit to life and pull trick-or-treaters to the doors of the homes they once protected.

In Manhattan, the pumpkin-carving tradition is alive and well as businesses prepare for the last-minute rush for the perfect pumpkin.

"For us, the pumpkin business has been very, very brisk," said Terry Olson, owner of Westside and Eastside markets. "We've had more sales volume in pumpkins this year than previous years. The reason primarily is because some of the pumpkin growers are having difficulty. Some didn't even have crops."

Excess rain when farmers were trying to control weeds caused some of the local crops to fail. Olson said this means more people have to rely on her markets and area grocery stores instead of making a trip to the pumpkin patch. For years, Olson has ordered her inventory from a Concordia farm and has had Britt Garden Acres deliver them throughout the season.

Britt Garden Acres, sells produce in the summer and pumpkins, corn stalks and straw bales in the fall season. A disease on the family's land makes it impossible to grow pumpkins, so the business buys and delivers pumpkins around the state. Tracy Britt, an employee of the store, said Britt Garden Acres will sell 200,000 pounds of pumpkins this Halloween season.

"We have quite a bit of an increase in business," said Britt, who likes the season because she can watch kids pick out pumpkins. "There's new faces we don't see all summer."

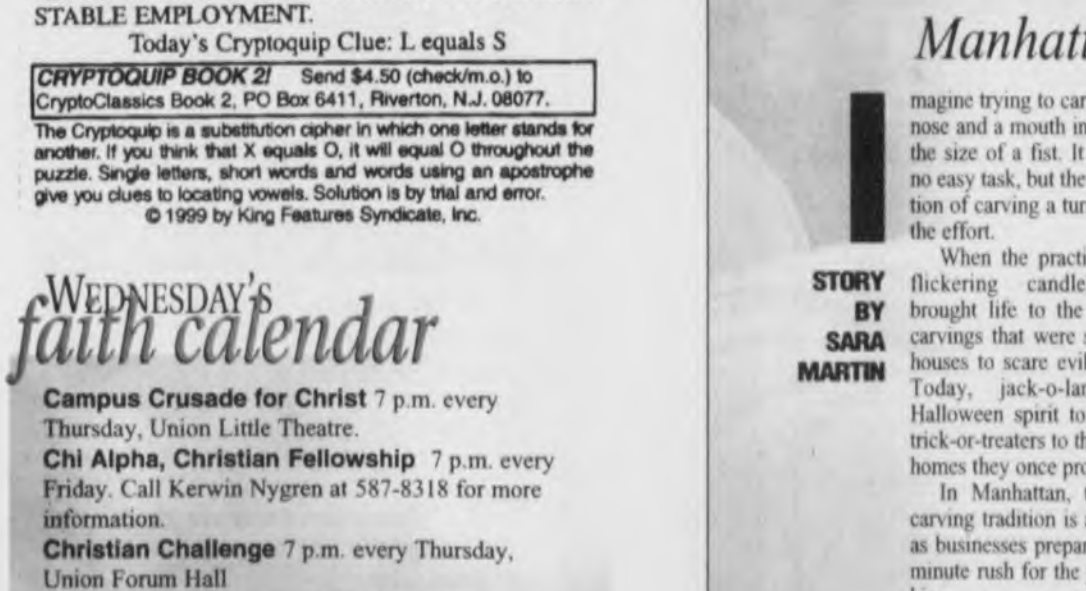
Olson's business also sees a tremendous number of pumpkin seekers.

Eastside and Westside markets price each pumpkin separately, averaging 29 cents per pound. She said they mark down pumpkins that don't have stems or don't stand up, but odd-shaped pumpkins sell really well.

"If the pumpkin is squatty or tall, that's not a detriment," she said. "People are always looking for different shapes."

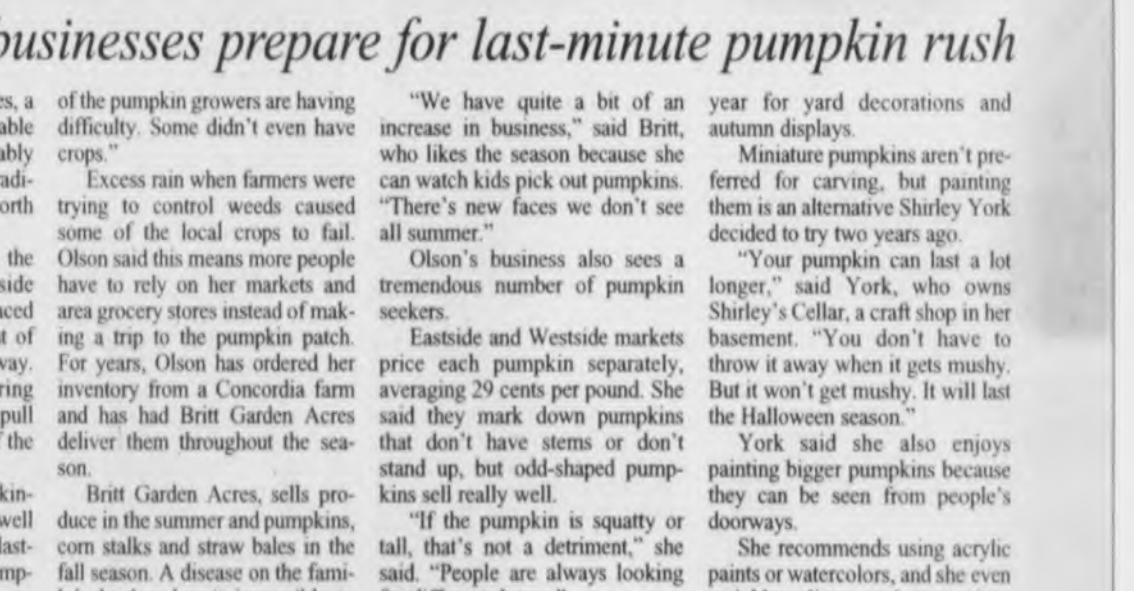
There are several types of pumpkins sold at the markets, ranging in size from miniature to Big Max pumpkins, which can weigh up to 100 pounds. These usually sell for $30 to $40 and Olson said they sell some each year for yard decorations and autumn displays.

Miniature pumpkins aren't preferred for carving, but painting them is an alternative Shirley York decided to try two years ago.



"Your pumpkin can last a lot longer," said York, who owns Shirley's Cellar, a craft shop in her basement. "You don't have to throw it away when it gets mushy. But it won't get mushy. It will last the Halloween season."

York said she also enjoys painting bigger pumpkins because they can be seen from people's doorways.



She recommends using acrylic paints or watercolors, and she even sprinkles glitter on her creations and adds straw for hair.

"Make sure the pumpkin is nice and clean before you start," York said. "Even wash it with dish soap. If you want to be really good about it, spray it with a clear lacquer first."

Chinese police arrest protesting sect members

BY JOHN LEICESTER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEIJING — Chinese police detained dozens of members of the Falun Gong spiritual movement — some of them teen-agers, some middle aged — on Tuesday after they went to Tiananmen Square to protest in defiance of a government ban on the group.

The low-key protest, which participants knew virtually assured their arrests, showed that a three-month government crackdown and campaign of vilification targeting the group's leaders had yet to eradicate the once widely popular movement.

Police took at least 36 people from the square, often in batches of six or more. They included middle-aged or older women and a middle-aged man in a dirty gray suit who was forced into a van along with seven women and teenagers.

By gathering in clumps amid the usual throngs of tourists on Tiananmen Square, the protesters apparently hoped to highlight their disapproval of a proposed law against Falun Gong and other groups China's communist leaders view as dangerous cults. The national legislature is reviewing the law this week at the Great Hall of the People beside Tiananmen Square.

Police in street clothes distinguished the Falun Gong adherents from Chinese tourists in the vast square by quietly asking people if they came to protest. Those who answered "yes" were pulled into police vans.

Gail Rachlin, a New York-based spokeswoman for the group, said the protesters just want the government to understand them.

"All they want to do is meditate," she said.

Falun Gong adherents were taken away after similar acts of civil disobedience at Tiananmen Square on Monday. A Web site run by the group said police beat and detained a dozen followers who unfurled a Falun Gong banner.

The group also claimed police followed protesters home and arrested about 1,000 people. Rachlin said two members jumped to their deaths from a train after being detained in Beijing and tortured. One was still handcuffed, Rachlin said.

The claims could not be independently verified.

Without directly addressing the allegations of mistreatment and mass arrests, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Zhang Qiyue defended the crackdown on Falun Gong as lawful.

"It is an illegal organization that constitutes a cult," Zhang said. "The organization has upset social order and has damaged the health of practitioners."

President Jiang Zemin likened Falun Gong to groups like the Branch Davidians in the United States and Japan's Aum Shinri Kyo. The Davidians' 51-day standoff with the FBI in 1993 ended with the deaths of 81 sect members; Aum killed 12 people with a 1995 poison gas attack on the Tokyo subway.

"No responsible government should let such cult activities go unchecked," Jiang, who is on a two-week foreign tour, told the French newspaper Le Figaro in an interview published Monday and excerpted by Chinese media.

Falun Gong was founded by a former government clerk who now lives in the United States. Its blend of traditional meditation, slow-motion exercises and Buddhist and Taoist ideas is said to promote health and morality. It had a wide following throughout much of China, particularly among pensioners, the unemployed and others who have trouble affording medical care.

will be evicted. The mobile homes she owns would have to be moved out of the park because ARC won't allow any more rentals of them, she said.

"My concern isn't for myself," she said. "I don't know where the people who live here are going to go."

Sharon Van Horn, spokeswoman for ARC, said any time there are rumors going around, the residents need to look at what the issues are, specifically for their mobile homes.

"This is not a mass going-to-be-evicted kind of thing going on," she said.

Van Horn said if residents are concerned about being evicted, they should contact their area manager, but Petre said he and others have already done that and haven't received any information.

Petre said the only information residents have received from ARC was in a welcoming letter it sent out when the park was bought.

"Basically, it said welcome, we're going to make this a nicer community type of thing," he said.

Lyndie Taylor, sophomore in secondary English education and a Blue Valley resident, said she is worried about being evicted when school is still in session.

"Not many rental properties are open in the middle of the semester," she said. "And what are we supposed to do with our trailer because they're old? There's no place to put them in Manhattan."

"They won't put anything in words of how long we have. They just have to give us 60 days notice."

room, but the amount is so small it wouldn't cause an increase in student fees."

The increase in the operations budget is due mainly to fewer advertisements sold, Carlton Getz, Student Publications finance chairman, said.

"If Manhattan keeps growing, we'll be able to sell more ad space," Getz said.

The decrease in the equipment budget is due to a "repair and replace" philosophy adopted to keeps costs low, Getz said.

To help students get their questions answered, an informational session on the proposed bill to restructure the Fine Arts Council will be at 5 p.m. Monday in the Big 12 Room of the K-State Student Union.

"The session is mainly to get all the people involved into one setting," Walker said. "Hopefully, we can get a good outcome everyone is pleased with."

U.S. urges Russia to open dialogue toward Chechen peace

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The United States and the Netherlands joined Tuesday in urging Russia to pull back its forces from Chechnya, where they are pounding the capital, Grozny, with artillery.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright already has acknowledged that her appeals to Russian Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov have not been heeded as Russian infantry and tanks battled with Chechen forces on the edge of the city.

Declaring the situation ominous, Albright registered deep concern with the escalating violence and mounting civilian casualties. "We urge Russia not to repeat the mistakes of the past in Chechnya, and instead to open a dialogue toward a peaceful resolution with legitimate Chechen partners," she said.

In a joint news conference, Dutch Foreign Minister Jozias van Aartsen said a warning toward Russia is necessary.

He also said he completely agreed with Albright, with whom he met before they talked to reporters.

Russian jets and artillery bombarded at least seven towns and settlements across Chechnya on Tuesday, officers on both sides said.

It was not clear whether the Russians were planning to take the capital, where sentiment for secession is strong. So far, the military has not revealed its strategy, saying instead that it just intends to destroy Islamic militants who invaded the neighboring region of Dagestan twice this summer.

On another front, stresses in U.S.-Russian relations were also evident as Deputy Defense Minister Nikolai Mikhailov said Russia would be able to overcome any defense against ballistic missiles that the United States could build.

"This technology can realistically be used and will be used if the United States pushes us toward it," Mikhailov said, according to the Interfax news agency in Moscow.

Russia vehemently is opposed to U.S. efforts to revise the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, which prohibits a national defense against missiles.

KU asks regents to look at anti-discrimination policy

BY SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The University of Kansas has asked the Kansas Board of Regents to examine a hot-button issue.

The KU Student Senate unanimously approved a petition asking the regents to include sexual orientation in its statewide anti-discrimination policy. The policy governs the six four-year universities in Kansas.

Lisa Braun, KU student senator, helped pass the issue at KU.

"This is an issue of fairness," she said. "We need to make this accessible at all state colleges."

"This is just the next step in line," she said.

William Docking, chairperson for the board, said he thinks this issue should not be made into a statewide policy.

"I would prefer to see matters stay at the campus level," he said. "We might be taking on too much if we take action on this issue."

Docking said the board likes to leave specific policies up to the individual universities.

"Traditionally, we have been reluctant to adopt system-wide policies," he said. "We like to set broad policies and allow each campus to debate and decide."

Last year, Emporia State University removed sexual orientation from its anti-discrimination statement in the student handbook.

The decision was met with much dismay and later reversed, Braun said. Emporia State now has a value statement, but nothing legally binding, she said.

Braun said she is worried something similar to the decision made last year by Emporia State will occur again. This is the primary reason the regents should adopt a statewide policy, she said.

Three regents universities now include sexual orientation in their anti-discrimination clause. K-State, KU and Wichita State University have included the clause.

K-State's policy includes race, sex, national origin, disability, religion, age and sexual orientation as basis of possible discrimination.

Korb Maxwell, KU student body president, said the sexual orientation issue is a matter of equal opportunity.

"It shouldn't matter where the school is," he said. "All students in Kansas should have equal educational opportunity."

Braun and Maxwell are divided in how optimistic they are that the board will pass this initiative.

"I am very confident," Braun said. "I don't see any other possibility."

Maxwell said he thinks the regents will want to back away from the issue.

"It's a hot-button issue, and I think the regents think it's a politically sensitive issue," he said. "I think they are also worried about the legislative backlash."

Docking said although the regents must keep in mind the legislative reaction, this will not prohibit them from considering the issue.

Maxwell said he also is concerned the regents will delay discussion because of the board's structural reorganization occurring.

Docking said he is unsure when the issue will be discussed formally, though he assures that it will.

There are several possibilities in how the board will deal with the proposal, he said. One possibility is it could go to its Commission on Public Universities. The commission could study it and make recommendations to the entire board. The proposal also could be referred to the Council of Presidents.

While the regents are waiting to discuss the petition, KU student senators plan to garner support, Maxwell said.

"We're going to build coalitions and form allies," he said.

Braun said Kansas should take opportunity to lead the nation in human rights.

"This is where the country is heading," she said. "Kansas has the chance to go to the forefront."

THE young AND tailgating

Eric McCarthy, sixth-grader at Marlatt School, participates in a Halloween tailgate party at his school. Instead of dressing up in traditional costumes, the students dressed up as K-State tailgaters.

JEFF COOPER/ COLLEGIAN

Manhattan sixth graders forgo traditional Halloween costumes for tailgating attire

BY SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chelsea Parker didn't want to dress up as an ordinary witch or ghost for Halloween this year. Instead, she wanted to dress up as a K-State football fan.

Parker, sixth grader at Marlatt School, got her wish.

Parker, along with her classmates, celebrated Halloween with a traditional K-State tailgate Tuesday afternoon.

"I'm going to tailgate when I'm old," she said. "I'm practicing now."

Each sixth grade class at the elementary school picked a theme for its Halloween party, Kris Nelson, sixth grade teacher, said.

"We wrote ideas on the board and the majority won," sixth grader Catie Ludlin said.

Ludlin said she was pleased with the vote.

Traci McCarthy, assistant teacher and mother, said the process of planning the event helps the students bond.

"The kids did a lot of the planning," she said. "This really pulls them together."

Rhonda Bowens, mother, organized the event. She said she was thrilled with the support and contributions from parents, who also were invited to the party.

"All the parents were so kind," she said. "They all brought food or supplies and really got involved with their kids."

McCarthy said inviting parents benefits them and their children.

"Parents can come and see what's going on with their children," she said. "It's good for the kids, too."

Bowens said she wanted to give the students the opportunity to experience tailgating.

"Some of the children don't get to tailgate," she said. "They're really excited about this theme."

The party also gave parents a great opportunity to spend time with their children, Nelson said.

"It's an opportunity for parents to take time out of their busy work schedule and come down with us," she said.

Bowens said it is important for parents and children to have fun together.

"The best part is partying and not having to learn for a day," she said.

"I am a firm believer in having a good time," she said. "We like to create memories here."

K-State officials continue push for soda deal

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Coca-Cola and Pepsi Cola machines today stand side by side in vending areas across campus. The operations are run by Vending Services, and the two companies share the market. In the new year, that all could change.

K-State officials said they hope to reach a decision on whether to sign a lucrative exclusive-rights contract with either Coca-Cola or Pepsi in the next couple of weeks.

"It will be at least two weeks, because we have to wait for the state to get back to us," said Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president of administration and finance.

The deal continues to be pushed back and has an ever-changing timetable.

The deal's final offers were turned in a week ago.

"The best and final offers are in, and they are being evaluated," said John Houlihan, director of purchases for the state of Kansas. "It will probably be another week or so before we sort through it."

Houlihan said it is unlikely further negotiations will take place once K-State makes a decision to accept an exclusive vendor or keep both vendors on campus.

Schellhardt said the negotiations are going well, but it might take time to iron out the details before a vendor is selected.

"At this point in time, both companies are very interested, and the proposals include support funds for the library and scholarships," Schellhardt said. "My feeling is it looks good for a contract."

The selection of a single vendor could have a huge effect on K-State, but Jake Wassenberg, Pepsi representative, said it would be a big letdown for both companies if K-State chose to do nothing.

"I think people would be blown away if they decided to do nothing," Wassenberg said. "I don't think anyone has even considered that."

Representatives from Coca-Cola declined to be interviewed for the story.

Houlihan said if a decision is made to sign a contract, it would take effect after the first of the year.

The length of a contract between K-State and a beverage company also varies according to the proposals. Schellhardt said the final proposals include a six-year and a 10-year contract option.

"Both proposals cover a length of 10 years as far as monetary offers go," Houlihan said. "The university can pick its own time frame. The athletic department has a contract, I believe with Pepsi, until 2006, and the strategy might be run out a contract, and then pull the whole university into a new pouring-rights contract."

The contract, Houlihan said, is constructed so that dollar amounts increase toward the end of the contract.

Another reason for the varying time frames is that the products students drink are changing constantly, Schellhardt said. He said he has looked at surveys of what types of products students prefer.

The issue has received a great deal of publicity in recent years, as drink-pouring rights contracts at universities have become big business. According to an article in The Chronicle of Higher Education, the exclusive signings began seven years ago when Pennsylvania State University signed a $14 million, 12-year contract with Pepsi. Since that time, the negotiations to be an exclusive-rights carrier have spread around the country, the article said.

Exclusive-rights contracts have been signed at other Big 12 institutions.

A similar deal has been reached at the University of Kansas with Coca-Cola. That contract was worth at least $8 million and included an upfront payment to the university of $7 million.

In the deal, KU receives $450,000 per year under a 10-year contract.

Schellhardt said the desire to look into an exclusive-rights contract started about a year and a half ago, at which time he said a committee was created to study the issue.

However, K-State has gone through the negotiations process differently than other schools because it is going through a state office. Other universities have used outside consultants.

Since the final proposals were received last week, the negotiations now are in their final stages.

The decision is in the hands of K-State's committee and the state purchasing office.

The negotiations in the boardroom likely would be the last competition between the two companies at K-State until 2006.

Houlihan said such deals don't necessarily diminish competition, but he said the competition is taking place at the negotiating table and not in campus hallways.

Landon Lecture postponed due to schedule conflict

■ Speech by House Judiciary Chairman Henry Hyde rescheduled for December; longer Congressional session to blame.

By JESSICA THOMAS
Kansas State Collegian

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., will not be speaking for the Landon Lecture Series on Nov. 5 due to a scheduling conflict.

Mike Connolly, spokesman for Hyde, said the lecture has been rescheduled for Dec. 1.

HYDE

"We got our House (of Representatives) schedule, and we'll be in session on the day we had scheduled," Connolly said.

Hyde, who has been chairman of the House Judiciary Committee since 1994, was a key player in the 1998-99 impeachment hearings and trial of President Clinton.

Cokie Roberts of ABC News will be the next speaker for the Landon Lecture Series at 11:30 a.m. Nov. 8 in McCain Auditorium. Roberts is co-host of the Sunday morning political show, "This Week With Sam Donaldson and Cokie Roberts."

The lecture can be heard live on the Internet at www.dce.ksu.edu/landon/.

Governor declines special prosecutor in Ramsey slaying

By JUDITH KOHLER
The Associated Press

DENVER — Gov. Bill Owens said Wednesday he has decided not to appoint a special prosecutor to look into the JonBenet Ramsey slaying, saying police are working with new evidence and headed in the right direction.

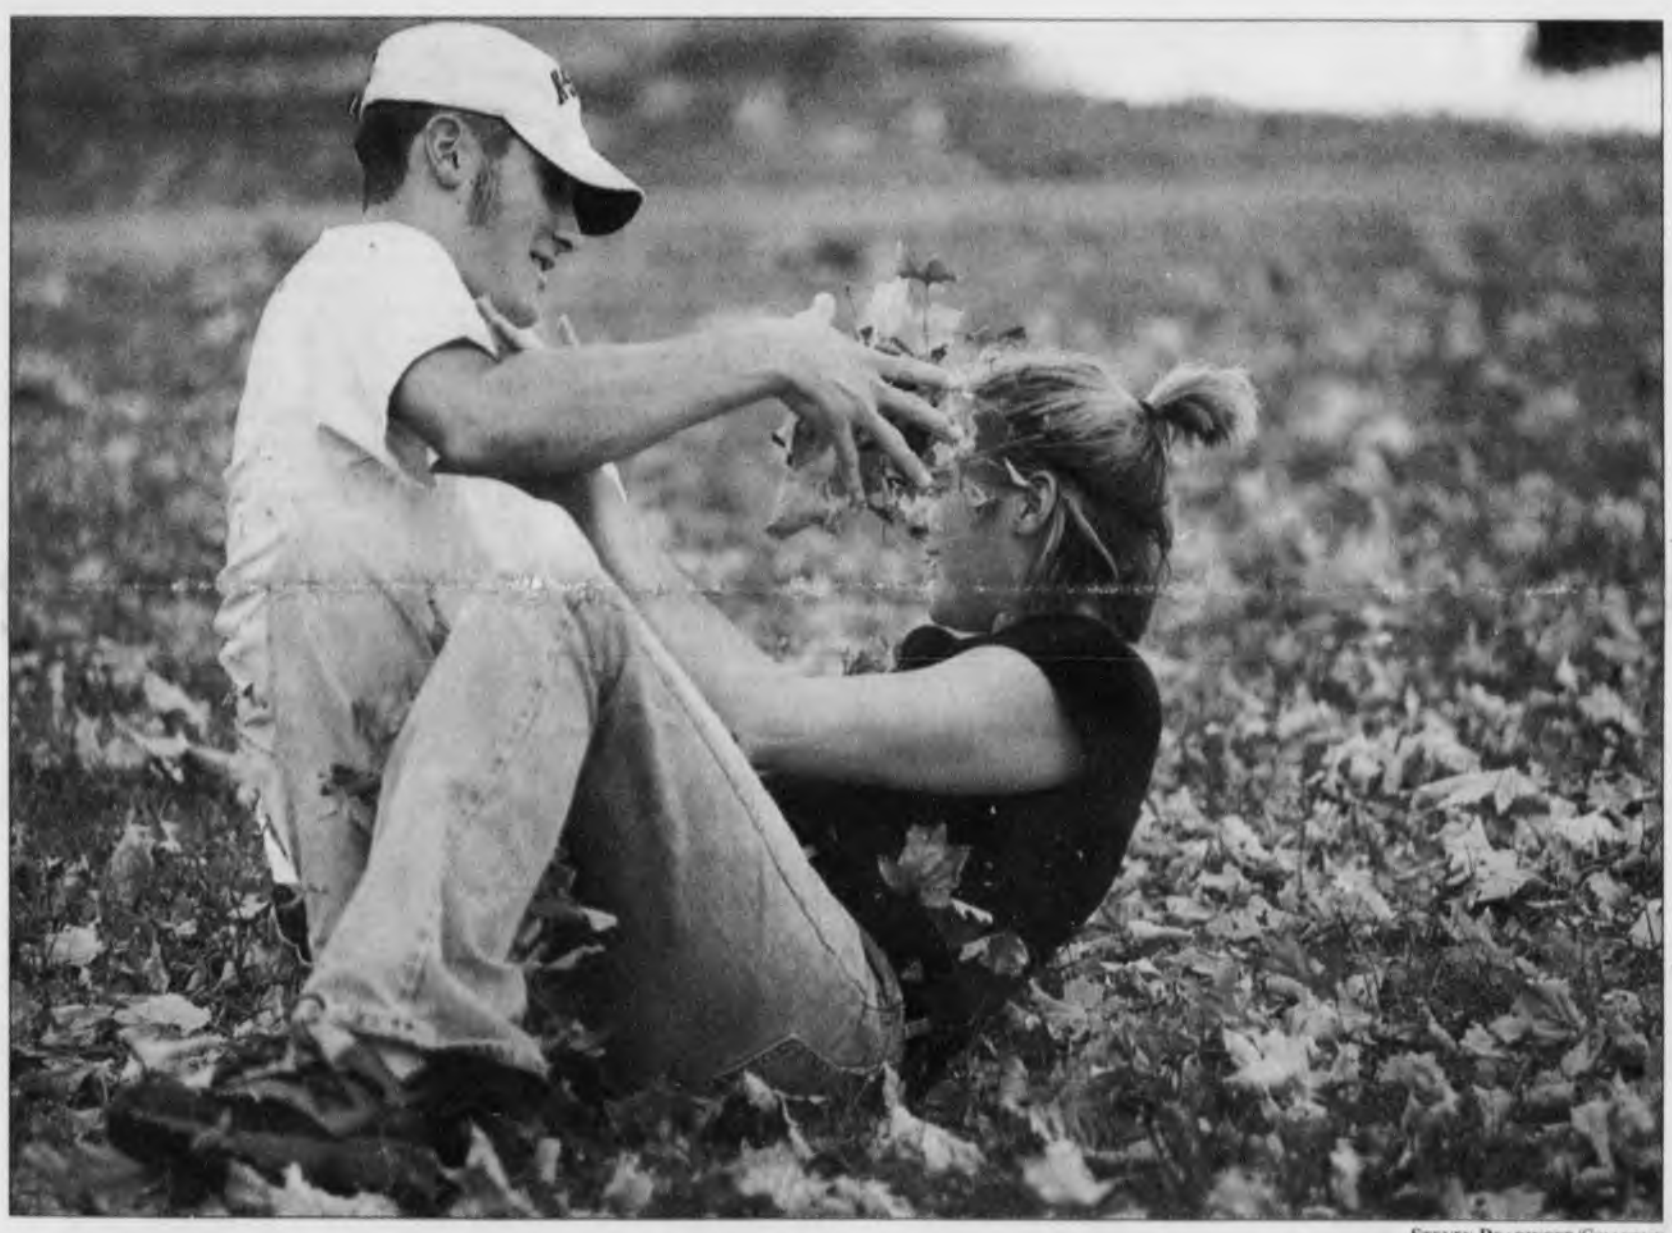
Owens also asked the little girl's parents, John and Patsy Ramsey, to stop hiding behind their attorneys and return to Colorado to help authorities track down their daughter's killers.

Two weeks ago, a Boulder County grand jury completed a 13-month investigation of the slaying without issuing any indictments. District Attorney Alex Hunter said there was not enough evidence to charge anyone, although he and police said the Ramseys remain under suspicion.

Owens also asked a task force to recommend whether a special prosecutor should be appointed.

On Tuesday, Owens said he had that investigators were on the right track and had new evidence, despite initial mistakes that harmed the probe.

"The killers in the case made some very serious mistakes, but they're also very smart. They have stonewalled very effectively, and they have covered their tracks well," Owens said.



"To the killers, let me say this: You only think you have gotten away with murder. There is strong evidence to suggest who you are. ... I think investigators are moving closer to proving their case. They will keep pursuing you. You will reap what you have sown."

Early on Dec. 26, 1996, Patsy Ramsey told police she found a ransom note demanding $118,000 for her daughter's safe return. Eight hours later, JonBenet's father said he found his daughter's body in the basement.

The Ramseys, who moved to the Atlanta area after the killing, have insisted they are innocent.

The governor declined comment on whether the Ramseys had a role in their daughter's death.

"If I could speak to John and Patsy Ramsey," he said, "I would tell them to quit hiding behind their attorneys, come back to Colorado and work with investigators in this case, no matter where that trail will lead."

Local coalition urges adoption of living-wage proposal

Organization's coordinator recalls economic hardships

By TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

Cities around the nation have adopted living-wage proposals requiring any business receiving public funds to provide workers with a minimum amount of pay per hour.

A Manhattan organization is hoping the Little Apple will be next.

The Flinthills Living Wage Coalition wants Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 and city and county businesses subsidized with public money to pay workers at least $8.11 per hour. Mary Jo Murphy, Flinthills Living Wage Coalition coordinator, said businesses paying low wages are leaving the City Commission with public tax dollars.

"We are handing out big amounts to these companies," she said. "If we expect them to pay a wage that can sustain a family, we won't have to subsidize them again through the Breadbasket or the homeless shelter."

Murphy said $8.11 represents the necessities that a single-parent family with two children would need if health insurance were provided by the employer. If health insurance is not provided, the living wage increases to $8.91 per hour.

Although no law is in place requiring publicly subsidized businesses to pay a living wage, Murphy said the coalition has sparked concern about wages in the community. She said the three businesses to leave the commission with tax money paid their employees a living wage.

Commissioners also are putting more emphasis on employee wages when determining whether a business should locate to Manhattan, Murphy said.

"They started looking at the situation and into the poverty facts here in Manhattan," she said. "We have made a pretty good case that we are not asking for an extraordinary amount."

Commissioner Karen McCulloh said employee wages have always been a factor when subsidizing a local business. She said decent wages is one of the criteria the Manhattan Economic Development Opportunity Fund Advisory Board looks at when determining whether a business should receive public funds.

"We get caught up in the numbers, but we are all talking about the same thing — good jobs for Manhattan," she said. "It's just impossible for the city to become the referee on what everybody makes in the community."

Market forces, rather than public policy, should determine the wages earned by workers, she said. McCulloh said increasing job training would make workers more valuable in the marketplace.

"It is very difficult to say everybody has to make a certain amount," she said. "If we are giving people subsidies to establish businesses here, then we should get good jobs."

According to a study by the Institute for Social and Behavioral Research at K-State, which was commissioned by the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, a single-parent family with two children needs $1,497 each month to supply basic needs for the family.

Mary Jo Murphy's oldest daughter would not accept the free lunch she was entitled to receive in high school. She kept the family's economic status to herself.

She was embarrassed of what friends would think. Murphy said her daughter was embarrassed of her mother's job.

"I knew I wasn't going anywhere. It was depressing to think about the future," she said. "I just lived day by day. It's changed my attitude. I see things are brighter."

Murphy said working in a convenience store, a gas station and a restaurant to provide financial stability to a family of three made her appreciate the activist work that now consumes her life.

Life wasn't always so fulfilling.

Welfare provided a means of existence that was unachievable working full time. Shoppers in line would make subdued comments about the food stamps that put food on the table of her single-parent family.

But the worst line was at the Flint Hills Breadbasket to receive free commodities.

Shooting suspect surrenders to police after fleeing state

CLAREMORE, Okla. — Oklahoma authorities have captured a Perry, Kan., fugitive charged with attempted first-degree murder and kidnapping.

Ronnie L. McPherson surrendered to Rogers County, Okla., deputies at his sister's home near Claremore on Tuesday. McPherson, 52, is being kept in the Rogers County jail pending extradition to Kansas.

McPherson is accused in the March 21 shooting of Kayla Riley. Records indicate she was shot three times. Her right arm is 90 percent paralyzed, and one bullet pierced a lung.

A call to Lawrence police led authorities to where McPherson was staying in Oklahoma.

Douglas County prosecutors last had contact with McPherson on Sept. 21 during a status conference in Lawrence. After that hearing, Douglas County District Judge dropped the charges and $125,000 bail because no one from the district attorney's office attended the hearing.

Those charges, but not the bond, were reinstated a week later. McPherson missed a pre-trial conference Oct. 12.

Helms has congresswomen removed amid controversy

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Sen. Jesse Helms ordered Capitol police to remove several congresswomen from a Senate hearing Wednesday after they disrupted the meeting by trying to present him a letter supporting an international treaty against sexual discrimination.

Helms, R-N.C., who chairs the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has blocked a Senate vote on the 1979 United Nations treaty.

Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Calif., led the congresswomen and several female staff members to Helms' office and then to the Foreign Relations Committee, where he was chairing a hearing on China. They tried to present him a letter signed by more than 100 House members in support of the U.N. Convention to Eliminate All Forms of Discrimination Against Women.

After asking the women to "please act like ladies," Helms directed Capitol Police to escort them from the hearing room.

"The women of the House will no longer tolerate his delay tactics," Woolsey said. She said Democratic representatives had attempted to meet with Helms for nearly five years on the treaty, but had been unsuccessful.

"I do not know what the senator's objections to the treaty could possibly be, because he hasn't told us," Woolsey said.

House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt, D-Mo., said later that any member of Congress should be able to enter a hearing, even unscheduled, and be allowed to speak. Helms' reaction to the congresswomen, he said, "is wrong. Shouldn't have happened."

Helms' staffers had no comment after the incident.

Helms, a critic of the United Nations, has often opposed U.S. participation in international treaties. He recently led Senate efforts to defeat ratification of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty.

Woolsey said 162 nations had ratified the women's treaty since the U.N. General Assembly approved it 20 years ago.

President Clinton submitted the U.N. convention on women's rights to the Senate in 1994. Helms has not scheduled hearings on the issue, or submitted the treaty to the full Senate for a vote.

Last year Secretary of State Madeleine Albright discussed ratification of the treaty with Helms. "It's not his favorite treaty, but I have made clear it is an administration priority," Albright said.

Mental health program plan faces problems due to cuts

TOPEKA — A legislative leader expressed frustration Wednesday because the state isn't starting a new program designed to prevent mental health problems among children.

The Legislature appropriated $1 million for the program. However, The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services decided it would not be wise to start the program when it and other agencies face budget cuts, spokesman Tim Hoyt said.

House Minority Leader Jim Garner said legislators sent a loud message that they thought the new program is important.

"The agencies are supposed to be administering the policy directions they get from the Legislature," Garner, D-Coffeyville, said. "This is a pretty blatant disregard of what the Legislature wanted."

Gov. Bill Graves has proposed cutting the current state budget by more than $43 million to deal with a revenue shortfall.

"We have to find some place to maintain other programs," Hoyt said. "This is a new program."

Ellen Piekalkiewicz, a lobbyist for the Association of Community Health Centers of Kansas Inc., said money spent now on mental health prevention will save the state from spending larger amounts for treatment in the future.

She also wondered why SRS, which has a budget of more than $1.4 billion, could not find the money to start the new program.

The money was allocated to help children, up to age 7, who had witnessed or been subjected to extreme cases of abuse, she said.

She said the program was patterned after one in Topeka that is supported by the United Way.

"The outcomes have been impressive: Children who go through it, when they get to be school age, they go to regular school, not special education. Diverting kids from special education is a huge cost savings," she said.

Hoyt said one reason SRS decided not to start the program was that there was no promise of additional money from the Legislature.

Piekalkiewicz argued that without a program in place, there will be no way for legislators to judge whether it is an efficient use of state funds.

KU chancellor writes article on evolution for magazine

LAWRENCE — The top administrator at the University of Kansas has written an article in which he says he hopes the state's recent debate over evolution sparks a renewed interest in science education.

In the current issue of the Chronicle of Higher Education, Chancellor Robert Hemenway calls for students to be scientifically literate.

The article deals with the State Board of Education's decision to de-emphasize the teaching of evolution in public schools. In August, the board approved new science standards that omit many evolutionary concepts as subjects for testing.

"I feel like there needs to be a kind of constructive end to what's been kind of an embarrassing episode," Hemenway told the Lawrence Journal-World in a story in its Wednesday editions. "It seems one thing that can come out of this is a renewed emphasis on science education."

Hemenway's piece outlines the board's recent decision to de-emphasize the teaching of evolution in the state's public schools.

Before the board's vote in August, Hemenway and the presidents of the state's other universities submitted a letter to the body asking that evolution remain in state science standards.

In the article, Hemenway writes: "Devout people — including many scientists — who find no conflict between their religion and their beliefs in evolution have been deeply offended by the board's action."

Hemenway said his article marked the first time he had been published in the Chronicle of Higher Education.

Students brave weather to build floats

BY SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They brave the unpredictable weather of Kansas. They layer their clothing and sometimes stand in close huddles for warmth. They spend countless hours outside working in a mass of chicken wire, tissue paper and glue. They do it all in the name of Homecoming floats.

"This is about a three-week project," said Staci Gaunt, junior in marketing and member of Alpha Delta Pi sorority. "There's always a few people working on it any time of the day."

One of the longest-running traditions, float building has become one of the cornerstones of K-State Homecoming.

Historically, float designs center around the general Homecoming theme. This year's theme is "'99 is Wildcat Time," said Mary Schwartz, Homecoming coordinator for Panhellenic Council.

"People can be creative within that theme," she said.

Jaimee Hedrick, sophomore in elementary education and social chairperson for Moore Hall, said residence halls pick float themes in committees.

"Basically, we had a sign-up sheet and we held meetings," she said. "Everyone at the meeting threw out ideas, and we decided what to do then."

"It encourages unity in the university because greek houses and residence halls are coming together to work on a project."

— Mary Schwartz, Homecoming coordinator for Panhellenic Council

Judging for the floats is based on three areas of criteria. Integration of the Homecoming theme counts for 33 percent. Another 33 percent is based on design and originality, and the remaining 33 percent is based on the overall appearance, which includes detail, material and visibility, Schwartz said.

Floats are judged by K-State faculty, administrators and others involved with the university but not directly involved with the greek community, Schwartz said.

Bernie Haney, chairman of the All-University Homecoming Committee, said there is a limit of $1,000 that each group can spend on float construction.

However, the focus of Homecoming is not just who wins a certain activity. Instead, the week focuses on school spirit, Schwartz said.

"It encourages unity in the university because greek houses and residence halls are coming together to work on a project," she said.

Building the float and working toward a common goal unites the greek community, Gaunt said.

"I didn't know a lot of the guys. I just started talking to them while we were building, and that's how I met them," she said. "Having the final project and being able to get excited about what we've done is great."

Hedrick said building the floats is a good way for students, especially freshmen, to get involved with the university.

"If they can get involved where they live, they feel a little more comfortable," she said. "They're adding to K-State and Homecoming."

When the projects are completed and displayed Friday in the Homecoming parade, Hedrick said all of the hard work will have paid off.

"It's going to be awesome," she said. "The experience was nothing like I thought it would be, but there will be this sense of accomplishment when it's all over."

Ghosts, goblins, children prepare for Fright Night

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Little ghosts and goblins once again have a chance to flock to Bramlage Coliseum tonight for Fright Night IV.

The night will start at 6 p.m. with a party on the concourse, Cindy Fox, assistant athletic director, said. From 6 to 7 p.m., greek houses and residence halls will be passing out candy to trick-or-treaters, and they will be competing for a free tailgate party provided by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

"We will have secret judges go around and pick out the best booth," said Bernie Haney, chairman of the All-University Homecoming Committee. "Then two winners will receive a free tailgate party on the K-State athletic department."

The men's and women's basketball teams will have booths outside, and they will be interacting with fans and admirers, signing autographs and building publicity for the upcoming season.

In addition to the two teams, this year's event will be part of the Homecoming competition. Fox said the different booths will be passing out basketball posters, schedules and cards.

Fox said the event is a good way to get the community involved.

"The teams are ready to go, and it is a good way to get the kids involved with the community," Fox said.

Event organizers also are encouraging people to bring in non-perishable canned goods that will go to benefit the Cats for Cans program.

Around 7 p.m., the lights inside the Coliseum will dim and spectators will get a chance to see this year's squad.

"They will come into the seats, drop the houselights and let the show begin," Fox said.

Willie the Wildcat will be in attendance, and Fox said he will help excite the crowd with his routine as the event starts.

Butch Hawking, assistant men's basketball coach, said this is a night the team looks forward to.

"It is nice to get out with the children," Hawking said, "because many of these young people look up to our players."

After Willie the Wildcat performs, fans will get the chance to see the two teams' creativity. The two teams will perform skits.

Assistant women's basketball coach Sue Serafini said she thinks the players will enjoy the event, which begins at 7 p.m. with a skit.

"I can't give away anything," Serafini said.

"But it will tell everybody where the focus of our program is."

Hawking said this year, the men's team is attempting to build a quality program.

"I think we are working toward putting a good product on the floor for the fans," Hawking said, "because the people deserve a good product."

Gunmen in Yemen capture American teacher, parents

BY AHMED AL-HAJ
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN'A, Yemen — Three Americans traveling in Yemen were kidnapped by tribesmen demanding the release of 25 suspects detained in an attack on an oil pipeline, a security official said Wednesday.

The Americans — a teacher based in the Yemeni capital and her visiting parents — were abducted by gunmen as they returned to San'a from a trip to the south Tuesday, the official said. He spoke on condition of anonymity.

The teacher, Marta R. Colburn, works for the American Institute for Yemeni Studies in San'a, said an institute employee who also spoke on condition of anonymity.

Colburn is from Portland, Ore., where she formerly was deputy director of Middle East studies at Portland State University.

Grant Farr, Colburn's former boss at the university, identified Colburn's parents as Don and Gladys Colburn.

In Washington, the State Department said it was working with the Yemeni government to try to secure their release.

"We remain hopeful because in these tribal kidnappings in the past, we have been able to secure the release of Americans and Yemen has been able to secure the release of other foreign nationals," spokesman James P. Rubin said.

Anti-discrimination policy needs revisions

No matter what your sexual orientation, you won't be discriminated against at K-State.

That guarantee is written into the university's anti-discrimination clause. Two other Kansas Board of Regents schools, the University of Kansas and Wichita State University, also include sexual orientation in their anti-discrimination clauses.

The remaining three regents schools should follow K-State's lead, but at least one regents school, Emporia State University, did exactly the opposite recently. Last year, ESU removed sexual orientation from its policy in the student handbook. The school later put sexual orientation back in the handbook's anti-discrimination clause, but it is not legally binding.

Students at KU want to change that. The KU Student Senate approved a petition asking the regents to examine this issue and write a statewide policy that includes sexual orientation. When the regents begins examining the petition, they could use K-State's policy as a model for the state.

K-State's legally binding policy doesn't offer a value judgment; however, it does make a commitment to protect all those who might be discriminated against.

Everyone deserves the right to an education free from discrimination. Kansans can take pride knowing that in at least three of its state schools it is possible.

Recent child-abuse cases suggest parents should have license to reproduce

You need a license to drink beer legally. A license must be obtained to own a gun, get married, rent an adult movie and buy a pack of smokes.

Some people should meet mandatory requirements and get a license to procreate.

A license is a humorous way to describe the overwhelming need for supporting adoption and prevention of pregnancy for those who are unfit parents.

This notion of the perfect world where a license would be required might have prevented abuse and neglect cases similar to the Mary Bass case of Kansas City, Mo.

Bass was the mother of five, which included 8-year-old boy triplets. Two of the triplets fell victim to her abuse according to the Oct. 23 issue of The Topeka Capital-Journal. It was abuse that resulted in the boys weighing less than 30 pounds and in the boys being burned with scalding water.

Last Friday, Bass sat in the courtroom and pleaded her innocence to the 10 charges of assault, abuse and neglect. She pleaded her case only hours after the second child died. The paper did not state the outcome of the case.

She told police the boys were discipline problems. To solve the problems, she would lock them in a bedroom for days. Once captive, she fed them only bread and water. The boys were only permitted to leave the room when they went to the bathroom. They were prisoners in their own home.

According to the newspaper, she began withholding food last summer.

Neighbors suspected something unusual was going on. Teachers saw signs of abuse two years ago. They alerted state social workers about their concerns. The Capital-Journal reported the Missouri Division of Family Services declined to say if the case had ever been discussed.

The signs were there. Those children had no reason to die at the hands of a selfish mother.

How many other children out there are being neglected and abused? How many things have been reported and then overlooked?

This summer, The Wichita Eagle reported a case in which five children were placed in foster care due to unfit conditions. When the police showed up to retrieve the children, they were greeted with floors covered in cat feces and cockroaches lurking in blankets.

The parents of the children said they loved their children.

They didn't.

If they loved their children, they would do whatever they could to care for them. They wouldn't let their children live in such an environment, regardless of their economic conditions.

These are two very different cases, yet they have a common bond. That common bond is parents causing pain to innocent children. It resulted in the deaths of two innocent boys.

The blame does not reside only on the authorities, although sometimes their lack of action, or an extremely slow pace of action, can be questioned — like when they were informed about the unusual behavior and the danger to the children.

Neighbors and teachers do not deserve the blame either. There is only so much they can do. They suspected something, but there is a lot kept from the world by windows, doors, locks and above all, threats. Parents threaten children, telling them to say everything is fine, even when everything isn't.

The problem with this abuse and neglect does not reside in the children, especially. No child deserves to be beaten, punished by starvation or burned.

The parents are the ones to blame. They are selfish, cold-hearted and too immature to care for a child. It was the parents who should have thought twice about having sex if they couldn't handle the "consequences."

How could someone burn his or her own child without thinking twice, beat their children without a second thought or deprive their children of food?

Perhaps this is just a repeated cycle of neglect and abuse. One that has spanned generations.

Maybe a license to have children is a little too idealistic, I admit.

Yet, had I asked the questions on the license test, I wouldn't have let the parents I mentioned above be near a child — let alone have one. Having a heart would be a requirement that I don't think they could meet.

I'm glad the independents can tell it's Homecoming Week, because we're actually doing something for the university.

I think for Homecoming Week, all the independents should wear white shirts on campus. It will be a new tradition.

This is to all my fellow brothers out there with no cash. Don't spend money on a girl. Pick her flowers in front of Lafene.

I think Homecoming is nothing but a whole week for greeks to strut around campus modeling their jackets.

How can you tell it's Homecoming Week? All the independents still aren't having any fun.

Confucius say: Greek who wear same Homecoming jacket five days in a row have bad b.o.

How many independents does it take to bash the whole greek system? Only one, because that's all they've got to do all day.

Will someone notify the high school seniors touring campus not to run right out and buy a gray fleece vest?

I just wanted to know why the Collegian used Monday's guest viewpoint column to once again inflict Russell Fortmeyer's opinion on us.

I think I figured out why independents don't drink during Homecoming Week. It's because they don't have any friends to be their D.D.

Does anyone else on campus feel like we're in an Old Navy tech vest commercial?

If 92 percent of students agree they can have fun without alcohol, then why are the bars in Aggieville always so packed? And if most K-State students usually have a designated driver when they're drinking, why do we need two columns in the paper for the DUIs?

Thanks to you greeks, it's officially unhip to zip.

Satan's little helper bane of columnist's nocturnal existence

I don't really want to write this column.

And it's not because I'm not excited. Nor is it because my deadline is in 45 minutes.

It's because I've read this column before. Someone writes it every semester, without fail. And I don't want to be "that" columnist.

Instead, I want to be that columnist! Or that columnist!

Whatever.

I'm just using my space this week to discuss the virtues of sleep — and believe me, there are plenty.

I love to sleep. Sleep sleepy. Sleep sleepy snuggly wuggly blankie tired no wakie me.

You all know what I'm talking about. There is nothing better than the feeling that courses through your entire body as you first hit the pillow. But the 15 minutes of blissful half-sleep before you drag yourself out of bed are almost as nice.

There are only a few things that can ruin sleep: the Bowl Championship Series, powdered laundry detergent, 1/2 percent milk and the alarm clock.

The first three are self-explanatory. We will focus on the clock.

Some inventions are necessary. Battery-operated, waterproof nose-hair trimmers, for instance, are necessary. Socks are necessary. Peanut butter was a good idea. The alarm clock is necessary.

But just because we need it doesn't mean we like it.

I've come to hate my alarm clock — the old-man kind with the 4-foot numbers I can see without my glasses to remind myself how early it is when I crawl out of bed. It is a monstrosity. A beast.

Satan's little helper.

I cannot stand the sound it makes. Neither can anyone else in my apartment building, from what I'm told. It is a loud, high-pitched "Reeettch! Reeettch! You're Lazy! Reetch!" sort of obnoxious squealing noise.

And herein lies the problem: The clock is too loud.

The moment it fires up its mechanical wake-up call, I hit the very large "Alarm Off" button. I'm not even awake by the time I've reacted to the high-pitched wailing noise. The alarm stops, I go back to sleep, and I miss the bus.

I've tried various solutions, including moving my clock to Ogden, Kan. This means I must get out of bed to reach the clock and, therefore, the button.

The only problem? The electrical outlet is next to my bed, and after a few days of effective wake-ups, I learned to reach blindly for the power cord and jerk the clock toward the bed. Alarm off. Back to sleep.

I've tried switching the alarm from the "Electronic, Piercing Noise Like Sick Cat" setting, instead selecting "Soothing Morning Radio Show Hosts Coaxing You Out of Bed With Bad Jokes."

Two problems.

There are no soothing morning radio show hosts in Manhattan. There aren't even any good ones. (Trust me. I listen to KXBZ-FM 104.7.)

Also, I enjoy the radio. It doesn't make me want to leave the bed. It makes me want to stay, slowly drifting back to sleep and singing "She Thinks My Tractor's Sexy."

So here we are again enjoying sleep and not seeing any way out.

Will this change when we age? They say college students need more sleep now than at any other time in their lives. Maybe someday we'll be our parents — sipping coffee at 5 a.m. and calling the sun a "lazy slacker."

There are a few things for which I can wake up. Give me a call tomorrow morning and invite me to breakfast, or just drop by with some Burger King and a cattle prod. Flowers would be nice, or maybe just cold, hard cash.

Instead, take a few moments each morning at 7 a.m. to remember me. I'm still around — just taking a few more minutes under the covers, humming a tune and wishing the "Reeettch!" away.

Well-intended advertisements destined to fail for 4 reasons

Editor,

I am writing in response to Project Wellness. Now don't get me wrong, I think anything to better the student body is great. It's just that I think this is a mistake. It is not going to work for several reasons:

1. People are fed practically from birth that college is an experience that requires them to experiment in all aspects of living, be they wild or otherwise.
2. Young people away from home for the first time generally want to let their hair down a little and get in touch with themselves.
3. Any intelligent person knows that these people (whoever they are) more than likely drank a lot in college and partied like rock stars.
4. And regardless of what happens, college people are going to drink. Leave it alone. If they drink to excess, so be it. College is part of growing up and taking responsibility for yourself. What better way of learning responsibility than arranging your schedule so you make it to class and survive?

I think that there are many other issues that plague students these days like depression, eating disorders and sleep deprivation. I am concerned for my fellow students, but let's let them be, OK?

Grant to help Paragon Technology expand

■ Company plans to move to Manhattan's industrial park, distribute computers.

BY SAM STIERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan received $270,000 in state and federal funds that will be used to finance the expansion of Paragon Technology.

John Wu, general manager of Paragon Technology, said the money will help Paragon become an international company, but also will keep it located here in Manhattan.

"Our new facility is four times the size of our old location," Wu said. "This will allow us to become a national and international distributor of computer components."

Paragon formerly was located in the 1st Bank Plaza on Claflin Road, and sold computer products and provided consulting services to the Manhattan area. Paragon has closed its old location permanently and will move into Manhattan's industrial park Nov. 12. Paragon Technology only will be a distributing center when it opens its doors after the move.

"We will no longer sell computers locally," Wu said. "The change will, however, create 15 new jobs in the next 36 months."

The city of Manhattan applied for the funds on behalf of Paragon Technology. Ann Harts, vice president of economic development at the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said when companies plan to expand or locate in Manhattan the city and company ask the state what grant money is available.

> "Paragon must create a total of 30 new jobs over the next five years in order to meet specifications set forth by the state."
> — John Wu, general manager Paragon Technology

"We always like to see local businesses expand," Harts said. "It's a great source of positive growth. We do all we can to help."

Paragon received $200,000 from the U.S. Small Cities Community Development Block Grant program.

Terry Marlin of the Kansas Department of Commerce said Paragon agreed to meet certain job targets in order to obtain the funds.

"Paragon must create 15 new jobs over the next 36 months," Marlin said.

CDB grant money is federal money administered by the state to cities whose population is less than 50,000. The cities then lend the money to businesses to help them expand.

Paragon joins Western Wireless, Sykes Enterprises and several other companies in Manhattan that have utilized this program. Over the next five years, Paragon will repay the city for the CDB grant.

The rest of the money received by Paragon was obtained from the Kansas Existing Industry Expansion Program. Money from this program also comes with stipulations.

"The KEIEP money becomes a forgivable loan if Paragon is able to reach certain criteria over the next five years," Harts said.

Paragon must meet certain growth numbers every year for the next five years. Marlin said if Paragon meets those numbers at the end of each year, the $70,000 loan will not have to be repaid.

"Each year Paragon meets the growth numbers set forth by the state, one-fifth of the loan won't have to be repaid," Marlin said. "They must reach those numbers every year in order for the entire loan to be forgiven."

"Paragon must create a total of 30 new jobs over the next five years in order to meet specifications set forth by the state," Wu said.

Student upset by availability of personal information

BY MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students who want to keep their personal information off the K-State white pages and campus phone book can do so, but many aren't aware of the option.

Sasha Anderson, senior in social work, said she did not want her information released, but that it was released because she did not know what steps to take to have it withheld.

"If you don't know that it exists, you can't get it withheld," Anderson said about the right to request that K-State withhold personal information.

According to page 18 of K-State's Spring 2000 Course Schedule, information deemed by K-State to be public includes a student's name, local address and telephone number, permanent address, photograph or likeness, e-mail address, date and place of birth and educational information including, but not limited to, college, curriculum, year and awards won.

> ■ MORE INFO?
> A full copy of the policy for handling student records can be found in the course schedule or obtained in the Registrar's Office, Anderson 118.

To have this information withheld, a student must submit a request to the Registrar's Office for each semester of enrollment.

Anderson said she wants the university to request the students' permission to release the information, and plans to start circulating a petition Monday.

"KSU printed my private information without my permission," Anderson said. "They will change that policy before I leave K-State."

It is important for students to realize, however, that all information will be withheld if a request is submitted, Gunile DeVault, associate registrar, said.

"It's an all-or-none process," DeVault said. "If they want their information withheld, it will all be withheld. Their name would not be in the graduation program."

Men's basketball elects Kitt, Reid as team captains

BY SAM STIERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tony Kitt and Josh Reid have been chosen to lead K-State's men's basketball team.

Wildcat head coach Tom Asbury announced Wednesday that Reid and Kitt were elected team captains for the 1999-2000 season. Both Reid and Kitt are seniors, but that's where the similarities end.

Reid hails from Brewster, Kan., and is a three-year letterwinner for the Cats. The 6-foot-6-inch guard/forward prefers to play his game on the perimeter. He ranks fifth all-time at K-State with 94 career three-pointers made and led the team with 55 long-range baskets last season. Reid averaged 9.7 points per game last year, which ranked third on the team.

Kitt is a stark contrast from Reid. The 6-foot 8-inch power forward from North Carolina is at his best in the low post. A physical player, Kitt led K-State in rebounding as a junior with 7.6 boards per game. Kitt set a school record last season by connecting on 60.1 percent of his field goals on the season. Kitt was named to the Big 12's All-Newcomer team in 1999, after transferring from Colby Community College.

The two seniors might have different styles of play, but Asbury said both are great representatives of the K-State program.

"There is a lot of responsibility that goes with being elected a captain," Asbury said. "Both Josh and Tony have shown that they are more than capable of living up to these high expectations."

The Wildcats play their first exhibition game at Bramlage Coliseum on Nov. 5 against the California All-Stars.

Journalist's treatment of Rose unwarranted

VIEWPOINT

KELLI ALLIS

Sunday night was a special night in baseball.

Before game two of the World Series, the All-Century team, voted on by fans, was announced. Some of the greats who were honored included Sandy Koufax, Nolan Ryan, Yogi Berra, Mark McGwire, Lou Gehrig, Jackie Robinson, Cal Ripkin Jr., Ken Griffey Jr., Joe DiMaggio, Mickey Mantle, Willie Mays, Babe Ruth, Henry Aaron, Ted Williams and Pete Rose.

Rose, who was banned from baseball 10 years ago, received the loudest and longest ovation from the Atlanta crowd. It really was a touching moment, as if the fans of baseball had forgiven him and wanted to see him back in the game. Unfortunately this moment was ruined about 10 minutes later by NBC journalist Jim Gray.

In case you didn't know, Rose was banned from baseball for allegedly betting on games, yet he stands firm that he didn't and never has apologized for something he said he did not do despite a lot of evidence to the contrary.

So Gray, instead of respecting Rose for his honor and for what kind of night it was, started pounding away at Rose with questions about the alleged betting. He asked him if he was going to apologize for gambling because now would be a good time, since the fans of baseball have seemed to forgive him. When Rose said he would not apologize for something he didn't do, Gray said the evidence is pretty strong against Rose. He went on to tell Rose that his approach has not worked in 10 years and maybe he should try another. He also said Rose can be his own worst enemy.

Rose held firm to his belief that he did not gamble despite the evidence.

You could tell Rose was starting to get flustered and frustrated with Gray's constant prodding questions about his alleged gambling and the ban. Rose said he was surprised at Gray for bombarding him on this festive occasion and that everyone was in a good mood, and Gray wasn't a prosecutor. Gray fired back, "Well, some would be surprised at you that you didn't take this opportunity."

I wanted to just jump through the television and punch Gray right in the face for his condescending attitude on such a special and serene kind of night.

Gray was trying to be a hard-nosed journalist, and on the right occasion those are good questions, but there is a time and a place, and that was not the time or the place.

Rose had just received an honor of being selected on the All-Century team and was allowed onto a baseball field for the first time in 10 years.

It was a special evening, and I just hope the interview didn't ruin Rose's mood for the rest of the night.

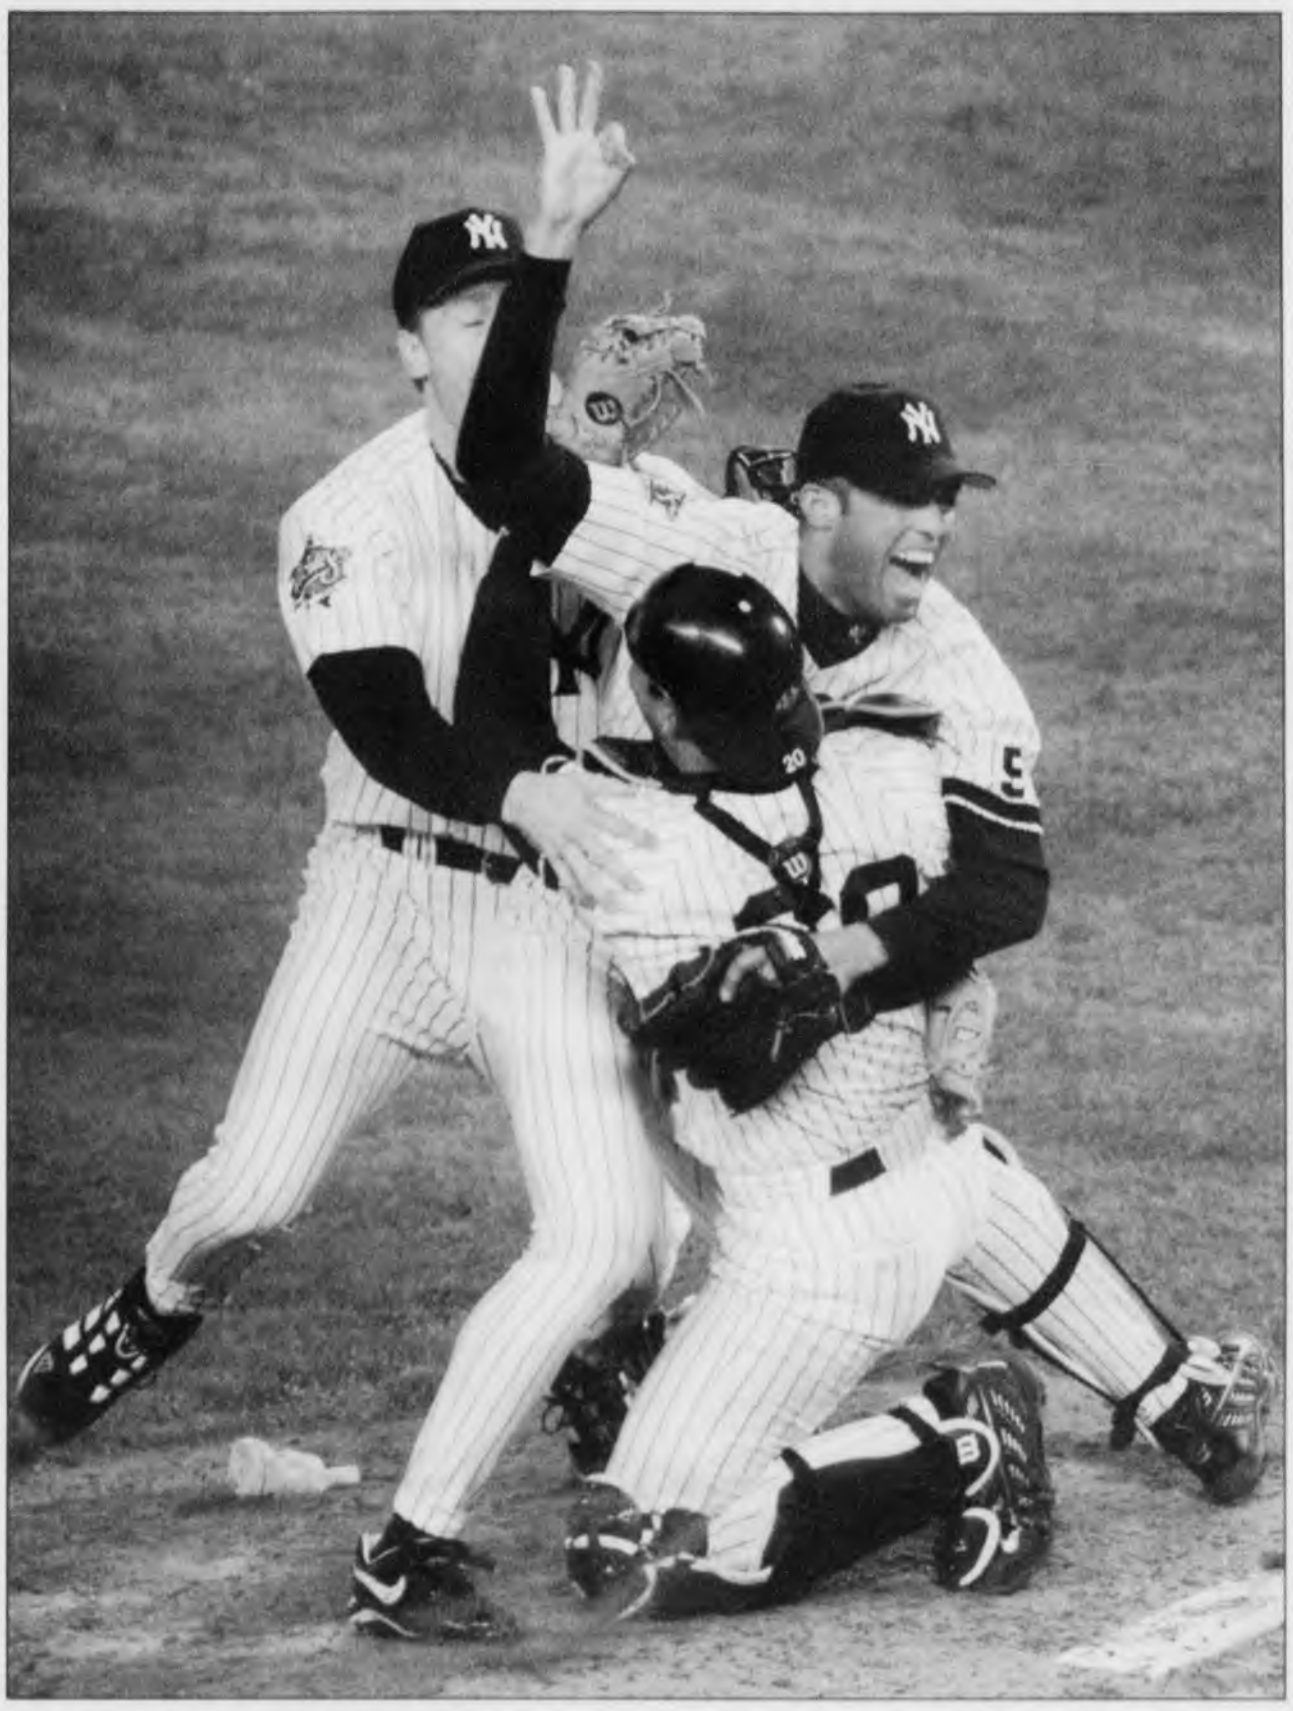
NBC stations became flooded with phone calls about the interview. Gray, a day after the interview, said he stood by what he did.

"I don't apologize. I stand by it, and I think it was absolutely a proper line of questioning ... I felt I did my job and I did my job well, but it wasn't a satisfying feeling to walk away from that."

Then, on Tuesday night before game three, Gray came on the air and issued a weak apology to the fans of baseball.

He said he believed it was important to ask Rose those questions, but if it took too long and it took the joy out of the occasion, then he was very sorry about that.

Though it was weak, at least it was an apology.



There were many negative responses to the interview across the country. Even NBC baseball analyst Joe Morgan said, "I was cringing and hoping that Pete would have the right answers. I was just hoping the interview would be over the next second."

Sean McDonough, CBS announcer and former colleague of Gray, said, "Here was this unbelievable moment with Pete coming back. I wouldn't have gotten into any of that. Maybe I would have been criticized for letting him off the hook, but I would much rather know how he felt being welcomed back like that for the first time in 10 years."

I couldn't have said it better myself.

BRONX TALE

New York Yankees pitcher Mariano Rivera is rushed by teammates Scott Brosius (left) and Jorge Posada on the pitcher's mound after the Yankees defeated the Atlanta Braves 4-1 Wednesday in game 4 of the World Series at Yankee Stadium in New York. It is the Yankees' 25th World Series win.

Led by ace Clemens, Yankees breeze past Braves for 2nd straight title

BY BEN WALKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The Rocket can rest now. The ring is his.

Roger Clemens pitched the New York Yankees to their second straight World Series sweep, shutting down the Atlanta Braves 4-1 Wednesday night and ending his quest for the one and only prize that eluded him.

With raucous fans waving yellow, plastic brooms all over the ballpark and Clemens bouncing around on the mound, the Yankees won their record 25th championship and third in four seasons.

"This must be what it's like to be a Yankee," Clemens said.

Game 4 marked New York's 12th Series victory in a row, matching the mark set by its Murderers' Row teams.

Clemens waited his entire career for this moment and, at last, commanded the stage. Showing the form that earned him five Cy Young Awards and 247 wins in 16 seasons, Clemens shut out Atlanta into the eighth to outduel John Smoltz.

Brought to the Bronx this spring from Toronto in a trade for David Wells that many Yankees fans disliked, Clemens walked off the mound to rousing cheers, tipping his cap and holding both hands high to acknowledge the ovation.

Mariano Rivera, who had two saves and a win in the Series, was selected MVP.

"I wasn't thinking about it," he said. "It just happens."

The Yankees finished off a week in which they simply overwhelmed the club that had best record in the majors, and accomplished a lot more along the way. They:

— Posted the first set of consecutive Series sweeps since the Yankees in 1938-39. New York beat San Diego four straight last year.

— Completed an incredible run in which they won 18 of 19 postseason games. The only loss came when Clemens was beaten by Pedro Martinez at Fenway Park 11 days earlier.

— Overcame a year of adversity, from manager Joe Torre's prostate cancer in spring training to the death of outfielder Paul O'Neill's father early Wednesday. Scott Brosius and Luis Sojo also lost their fathers, Hall of Famers Joe DiMaggio and Catfish Hunter died and Darryl Strawberry was beset by health and legal problems.

— And, in the last game of the 20th century, their All-Century team pitcher ended all debate about which club was most dominant this decade.

"We are a good team and we don't rest on our laurels," Torre said. "From 1996 to the end of the century — wow."

For Atlanta, the loss was its record-tying eighth straight in the Series, a string that began in 1996 against the Yankees. It surely was a bitter disappointment for the Braves and manager Bobby Cox.

"I think they think in their minds that they had a tremendous year with all the ballclub went through," Cox said. "They're disappointed just like I am."

After winning the title in 1995, they had "Team of the 90s" engraved on their rings. Instead, they joined the New York Giants of 1910-19 as the only teams ever to lose four World Series in a decade.

Golf team ends season with 14th-place finish in Waco

BY KELLI ALLIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's golf team ended the season Tuesday in 14th place out of 16 teams in Waco, Texas.

The team was tied for fifth after the first round of play at the Baylor Invitational, but after the second it had slipped to 11th.

"We counted some high scores," Coach Tim Norris said. "Eighty-three the last round, the second round was not a bad round, but certainly didn't help us. Two guys struggled and had bad rounds, which happens, unfortunately, but we had to count them."

Senior Mark Sears led the Wildcats; he tied for 30th with a score of 220. Sears shot a one-over-par 71 in the final round.

"Mark had a good round yesterday," Norris said. "If we could get two other players into the 30s, the middle of the pack at this tournament was very achievable."

Junior Dan Demory tied for 43rd place with a score of 223. Sophomore Matt Williams tied for 66th place with 227.

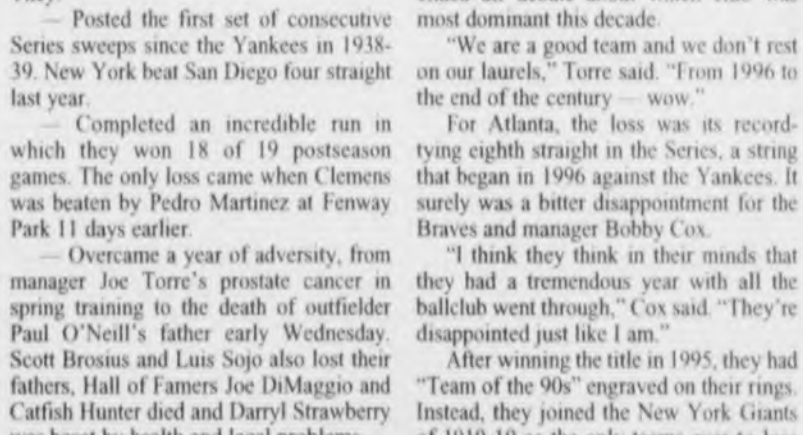
"Matt showed some improvement," Norris said. "Number one, you get experience, and number two, you learn from the experience."

Freshman Daryn Soldan, who was making his first collegiate start, tied for 82nd place with his score of 234. He was two-over-par in his first round.

"Daryn started out with a great round," Norris said. "He birdied his first hole of college golf, but then probably some inexperience. If you have weaknesses in your game — a tournament exposes it."

Sophomore Scott McNeely finished tied for 84th with a score of 235.

Norris said the course and the weather were perfect.



"The course was beautiful," he said. "Everybody was really happy. Not overly a long ball, the greens were fast. Weather was perfect, so we can't use an excuse that way."

The Wildcats will be taking a few weeks off from golf before they start practicing again in mid-November.

"Condition exercises, stay in shape over the winter," Norris said. "Get back into golf in mid-November. I don't know if it will be indoor or outdoor, but we will work on golf basics and be ready to go when school starts in January."

The first tournament of the spring season for the golf team is around the end of February, and it will be in Victoria, Texas, which is the site for the NCAA regional tournament.

"I think we still have a chance," Norris said. "I don't discount and I have definitely not given up on our team making a late run. Who's to say we can't make a regional tournament?"

JEFF COOPER/COLLEGIAN

Bryan Milberger lines up his shot at the Kansas Invitational on Sept. 20 in Lawrence. The Wildcats finished sixth out of 15 teams at the D.A. Weibring Intercollegiate in Normal, Ill, Sept. 25-26, their highest finish all season.

THURSDAY'S health question

Q: Can the flu shot cause flu symptoms?

A: "No," said Carol Kennedy, director of health education at Lafene Health Center. "The flu shot is an inactivated viral vaccine, which is grown in chicken eggs, harvested and then killed through chemical means. The vaccine is purified, tested for safety and its ability to stimulate antibody production in humans. Because the vaccine is killed, it cannot cause the flu. A common side effect of the flu shot is local tenderness at the injection site. If flu symptoms develop after receiving the vaccine, it is more likely that the person was exposed to the flu prior to receiving the vaccine. It takes about two weeks for immunity to develop after receiving the vaccine. According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices, the flu vaccine is safe — 'it is the best way to protect against flu and its complications.' If you are allergic to eggs, do not get the vaccine."

COPING with MENINGITIS

STORY BY SARA MARTIN

Disease poses extra threat to students living in residence halls

October might be the month for flu season, but health officials at Michigan State University have been dealing with a different sort of illness.

Meningococcal meningitis is a silent killer disguised as the common cold. Sometimes infected people mistake the high fever, headache, neck stiffness, confusion, nausea, vomiting and lethargy as a bad case of the flu or winter blahs, putting themselves and people in close contact at risk for the potentially fatal disease. At the greatest risk are college students living in residence halls.

"The risk to individuals in dorms, particularly freshmen, is higher than others on campus," said Cathie Barry, director of nursing at Lafene Health Center. "Certain behaviors can compromise the immune system of an individual and increase the chance of catching the disease."

ON THE WEB
For more information about meningitis look on the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention web site at www.cdc.gov/ncidod/dbmd/diseaseinfo/ and the American College Health Associaiton web site at www.acha.org.

These behaviors include binge drinking, lack of sleep and living in crowded conditions. A study done by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention also found that smoking and bar patronage also are significant factors in the chances of contracting the disease. However, maintaining a healthy diet and lifestyle have been shown to reduce the risks.

Meningitis is an inflammation in the lining surrounding the brain and spinal cord. It is spread through respiratory and throat secretions, such as coughing and kissing.

Viral meningitis is the more common form and cannot be treated with antibiotics. This type usually runs its own course without much chance of serious effects. Bacterial meningitis, however, can cause grave illness. Antibiotics usually are effective if the disease is detected in its early stages, but 10 to 13 percent of 3,000 people infected annually in the United States die, even with antibiotic treatment.

Michigan State has been forced to deal face-to-face with the illness in the past three years. In December 1996, one student died of the disease; another student died in February 1997. A few months later, a third student became sick but recovered. The latest case of meningitis at the university came at the beginning of October of this year, when a student living in a residence hall was diagnosed with the disease.

Michigan State, which has more than 40,000 students, decided to take action. In spring 1997, the university offered free immunizations, which are usually effective in preventing all but one strain of the bacterial disease. More than 19,000 people took advantage of the opportunity. The newest incident spurred yet another mass immunization, reaching 14,000 more.

"When we went through the same thing a few years ago, I think it was a good learning experience," said Tom Oswald from university relations at Michigan State. "Everyone already knew what they were doing, so it wasn't like we were having to reinvent the wheel."

The campus health center offered information and a special hotline for people with questions. All of those with close contact to the infected people were treated with antibiotics, and potential outbreaks were avoided.

"There wasn't a feeling of fear," Oswald said. "But there was an atmosphere of concern. We have a heightened awareness of meningitis. I'm sure the (university) president feels that one case is too many."

However, the CDC does not officially recommend mass immunization in cases of individual outbreaks.

"I'm aware of this occurring at other campuses," Barry said. "It's not that it's the wrong thing to do. It's just not necessarily recommended because you can treat the disease effectively with antibiotics. It's not easily contracted like the plague or something. And even after you get the vaccine, it takes seven to 10 days to develop an immunity."

Today, the Michigan State community is quite aware of the symptoms, a key factor in early diagnosis. Before the first case, though, not much thought was given to the dangerous disease.

"Sure, there's an attitude of 'it can't happen here.' But gee, it sure might," Oswald said.

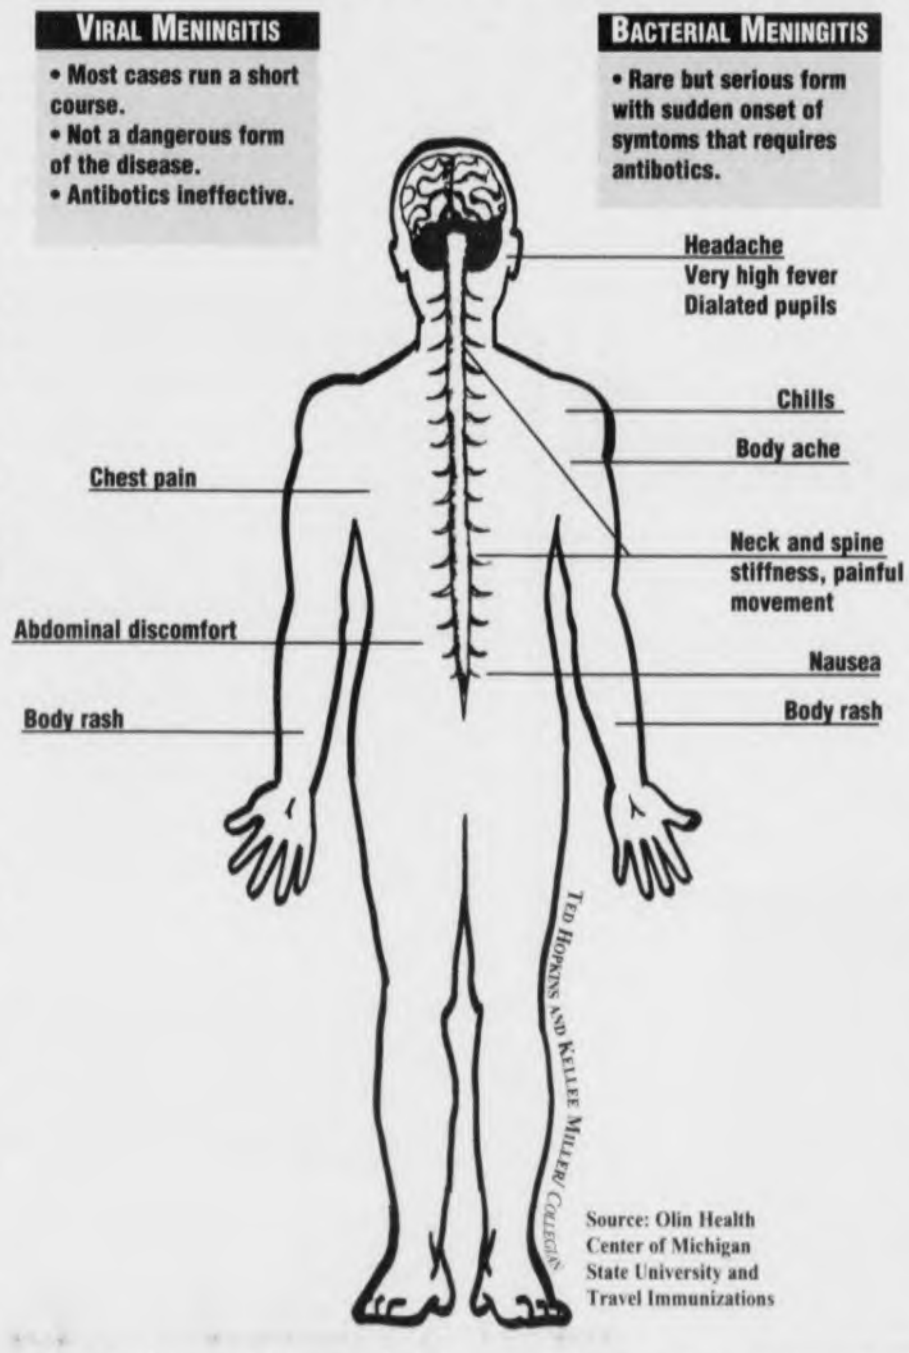
Surprisingly, and unknown to most, a K-State student was diagnosed with meningitis last spring. The student went to Lafene with the telltale symptoms and was sent to the hospital for a spinal tap to diagnose the disease. Nearly 100 people considered close contacts were effectively administered antibiotics.

"We reacted quickly and treated contacts promptly," Dr. Jay Reppert, medical director at Lafene, said. "We did what the CDC and the Kansas Department of Health and Environment have advised me. In fact, we did more than recommended."

Many factors were considered when deciding how to deal with the case of meningococcal meningitis.

"It's not as tremendously contagious as might be assumed," Barry said. "The way it's transmitted ... it's not as contagious as diseases such as the cold or the flu. It's not spread through casual contact or sitting next to someone who has it."

The CDC does not suggest that college health centers recommend students be vaccinated.



The CDC Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices instead released a statement Oct. 21 recommending that health providers simply provide information about meningitis and the benefits of vaccination to students living in residence halls.

"I think students need to be aware of the risk and look at the statistics and then decide what they feel is right," Reppert said. "No organization has outright said we need to recommend a vaccine to college students. They do suggest we make the information and vaccine available to them."

Reppert also said students who do not have spleens or those with complement component deficiency are at a higher risk of contracting meningitis. He suggests these students especially be aware of the facts of the disease.

Students interested in being immunized call Lafene. The cost is $65, and most insurance companies do not cover it.

"Even in college students, the risk is about one in 20,000 students," Reppert said. "The students need to decide where their health dollar is best spent. It's a good way to protect yourself, but on the other hand, the risk is very low."

Hard-to-detect STD affects majority of sexually active population

By JENNIFER LAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sexually active K-State students need to take note of a fairly harmless but incredibly contagious STD, said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center.

Human papilloma virus, or HPV, is a sexually transmitted virus that comes in genital wart form and is the most common STD in the United States.

Kennedy said 5.5 million new cases of HPV are diagnosed each year.

Kennedy estimated that 80 percent of sexually active people have HPV.

"Students at K-State definitely reflect that national statistic fairly closely," she said.

Women's Clinic Director Dr. Wendy Blank said the reason HPV has such a high number is because it is virtually impossible to diagnose the disease until it is already full-blown, since its symptoms are almost nonexistent until it is in its wart form. Even then, most often the warts are non-irritating, and because they come and go, most people either don't realize they have it or don't have it checked.

"An estimated 20 million people are currently carrying HPV because so many people are unaware of their infection and continue to spread the virus," Blank said. "Often the warts are internal, and unlike herpes, rarely are painful or itch."

Prevention of HPV is much like prevention of other STDs, Blank said.

"The only way to prevent spreading is ultimately, no genital-to-genital contact," she said. "Many people think just abstaining from intercourse will protect them, but often it won't if people are still sexually active otherwise.

"It is important to always wear a condom," Blank said. "Women also need to get their yearly pap smear checkups done because there has been a link found from HPV to cervical cancer."

Blank also said it is possible for men to get anal or penile cancer from the warts, but the chances are low.

Most importantly, if people think they have found a wart, they should check it with a doctor.

There are many treatments used for HPV, but treatments vary from person to person.

Blank said the goal of treatment should be to remove visible genital warts and get rid of annoying symptoms.

Treatment can induce wart-free periods in most patients.

Recurrences occur most frequently during the first three months. The removal of warts might or might not decrease infectivity.

Also, if left untreated, warts might remain unchanged or increase in size or number.

One treatment of HPV is the Podofilox solution or gel, which is applied by the patient for external warts. It is relatively inexpensive, easy to use and safe. Aldara cream is another patient-applied treatment that has similar aspects as Podofilox, but offers an alternative to tissue-destuctive therapies.

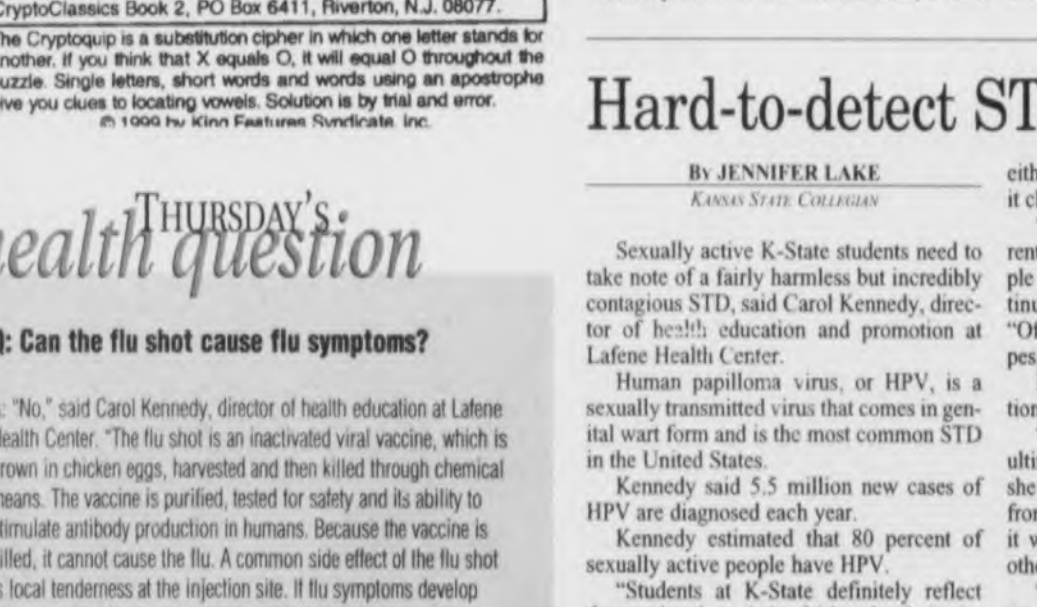
It acts by encouraging the body's own immune system to be more active and seems to work better in moist areas. It also seems to work better for women than for men, Blank said.

Cryotherapy is the procedure of freezing off the wart using liquid nitrogen. It is also inexpensive, but must be performed by a trained health-care provider.

Trichloracetic acid is a chemical applied to the surface of the wart by a physician.

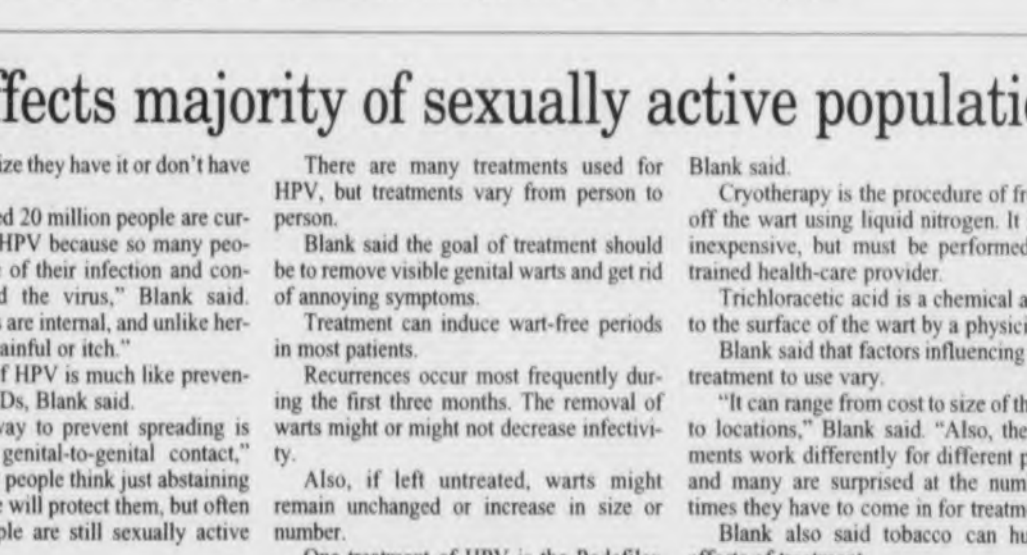
Blank said that factors influencing which treatment to use vary.

"It can range from cost to size of the wart to locations," Blank said. "Also, the treatments work differently for different people, and many are surprised at the number of times they have to come in for treatment."



Blank also said tobacco can hurt the efforts of treatment.

"Smoking can affect the immune system, which then can affect this," she said.



Both Kennedy and Blank stressed the importance of being knowledgeable about HPV.

"Genital warts can be treated and managed," Blank said. "Students don't need to lose sleep over this. They just need to know the facts and get it checked out if they suspect they have it, so they don't spread it more."

WAGES

"That really bothered me more than anything — having to go and stand in that line," she said. "There is this idea that if you work hard, you can climb the ladder, and people are realizing it's not true. People work hard every day, and they will probably be in that same position for the rest of their life."

Sitting near the hallway of her east Manhattan home, she eats a sandwich after work. Her job now pays a living wage, and she struggles to provide others with the same opportunity at the Flinthills Living Wage Coalition.

Occasionally taking a drag from her cigarette, she said finding somewhere to live in Manhattan was difficult. Part of her housing was subsidized, and Murphy said landlords presumed they might never see part of the rent, or they thought the house would be in worse condition after allowing someone on public assistance to live there.

"The most I remember about it is how it made me feel so crappy," she said. "People don't realize that these women aren't just sitting there watching TV."

The bottom drawer of the black file cabinet near the computer is filled with folders — some containing information about Murphy's full-time job at Speak United and others regarding the living wage policy.

"Part of the reason I got the job was because they know I struggled myself," she said. "I'm real motivated because I really believe in a living wage."

People earning low incomes can make a difference, Murphy said. She said they internalize a devaluation that results from society's misconceptions about the working poor. They are less likely to vote and voice their opinions.

She said working together, they could make needed changes.

"We have departed from the fact that we need to take care of everyone in society," she said. "We need to move back toward that goal."

Murphy said she will continue doing activist work, in part because of the confidence it brings. She said compared with past jobs, striving for decent wages for Manhattan's working poor comes from the heart.

"I turned it into a positive because it really motivated me to make changes. Hopefully other women like myself won't be going through the same thing," she said. "Now that I make a living wage, I don't really make that much more money because I pay my full rent and all of my groceries, but I have my dignity, and that's a big difference."

LIVING WAGES

local organizations and residents who supported a living wage in forming the coalition.

Murphy said businesses that care about their employees should pay a living wage, and businesses that do not care are unwanted in the community.

"There are a lot of low-paying jobs in Manhattan, and I think we need to be picky," she said. "There is a lot of poverty in Manhattan."

Michael Oldfather, associate professor of economics, said a living wage ultimately would lead to higher consumer prices. By raising the price of wages, the costs will be passed on in higher prices for goods, he said.

He said if businesses are forced to pay workers more than they are worth, some firms will be forced out of business, while others will shift away from hiring additional workers.

"If you can't operate profitably, it's just not realistic to pay people more than they are worth," he said. "It's one thing if it's applied to the whole country, because there is no place to escape. If you do it locally, you're going to end up losing jobs."

Oldfather said paying workers less than a market-driven wage will result in high turnover and increased expense from re-training additional workers; therefore, most workers are paid what they are worth in the marketplace.

He said the coalition could provide computer training or other job-training skills to make workers more valuable.

Oldfather said a living wage would also reduce the number of workers employed in Manhattan and could lead to businesses leaving the city, since labor costs would be cheaper elsewhere. Rather than a living wage, he said public assistance provides fewer negative side effects to society.

"It makes better sense to transfer general tax revenues, because if you impose on an employer a wage higher than the market forces, it penalizes those who produce those products," Oldfather said. "It's much fairer for all of us to pay taxes to help our less fortunate neighbors."

John Exdell, founder of the coalition and associate professor of philosophy, said the city has improved its efforts to bring decent paying jobs to Manhattan.

He said some area business owners oppose efforts to raise wages by public policy.

"Even though they don't think the policy applied to economic development would hurt them, they don't like the claim that businessmen are being unfair to workers," Exdell said. "They deeply resent that idea."

He said the coalition would like to bring a resolution to the City Commission early next year.

All workers of publicly funded businesses and USD 383 then would be paid their worth, Exdell said.

"It will clearly benefit workers who are not getting the deal they should be getting right now," he said. "It makes a statement that we value the contributions of working people."

The coalition will continue speaking with organizations in the community about the living wage proposal. It is also seeking to hire a full-time organizer in January, pending a grant that would pay for the additional employee.

Exdell said Manhattan residents often confuse the living-wage proposal with a minimum wage.

Murphy said businesses that care about their employees should pay a living wage.

He said the living wage would affect a small portion of the population and does not attempt to establish an income rate for the entire community.

"In a country as rich as ours, anybody who works full time should make enough money to support a family," he said.

Shirley Bramhall, director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, said although Manhattan needs better wages, establishing a set wage could hurt local businesses.

"I can't see why anybody would be opposed to paying people a living wage, but with the economics of having a wage you must pay, Manhattan is going to price itself out of the market," she said. "But I don't know if you can put a value on someone. I think everyone is worth a living wage."

Russian troops seize 4 villages in move to surround Grozny

BY RUSLAN MUSAYEV
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GROZNY, Russia — Russian jets screamed over the Chechen capital Wednesday, bombing houses and killing scores of people as ground forces fought to approach the city from three directions.

The attacks were some of the heaviest against Grozny since Russia launched its campaign to wipe out Chechnya-based Islamic militants.

President Boris Yeltsin said Russian troops would not stop their offensive until they destroy the center of international terrorism in Chechnya.

Chechen military headquarters said 116 people, mostly civilians, were killed in Wednesday's air and artillery attacks, but the figure could not be confirmed. Streams of desperate civilians fled to the countryside.

Huge plumes of smoke rose over Grozny as pairs of Russian jets roared over the city. Bombs and rockets destroyed houses and apartment buildings, including the home of warlord Shamil Basayev.

Basayev's fighters were among those who twice attacked the neighboring Russian republic of Dagestan in August and September, prompting Russia to launch the campaign to eliminate them. Russian officials also blame the militants for apartment bombings in Russia last month that killed some 300 people.

Russia repeatedly has said its military actions are limited to attacking rebel positions. Air Force Chief Anatoly Kornukov said Wednesday that peaceful civilians both in and outside Grozny are spared missile and bombing strikes.

But Chechen Vice Premier Kazbek Makhashev called Wednesday's raids state terrorism and a slaughter of the people.

Scores of civilians, including women and children, have been killed by the attacks on Grozny and other Chechen towns in recent weeks, according to independent observers.

Yeltsin said Wednesday that Moscow was determined to press ahead with its campaign.

"Russian soldiers and officers are bringing peace back to the long-suffering Chechen land," he said in his most extensive comments yet on the fighting.

Yeltsin left Moscow on Wednesday for a vacation, apparently content to let his officials handle the war.

Russia repeatedly has said its military actions are limited to attacking rebel positions. Air Force Chief Anatoly Kornukov said Wednesday that peaceful civilians both in and outside Grozny are spared missile and bombing strikes.

Meanwhile, Russian forces in eastern Chechnya took control of four villages and surrounded two others, Russian Defense Ministry spokesman Gennady Alyokhin said. Russian forces in the region were focusing air and artillery raids on he nearby city of Gudermes, he said.

The four captured settlements — Azamat-Yurt, Stepnoye, Nizhni Gerzel and Kadi-Yurt — lie along a strategically important highway running east to Dagestan and just a few miles from Gudermes, the Russian military command said.

Gudermes, Chechnya's second-largest city, is 20 miles east of Grozny. Seizing it would be a large step toward full Russian control of eastern Chechnya. The city has been well fortified by militants.

The offensive in the east came as Russian tanks and soldiers closed in on Grozny from the north. Chechen militants traded fire with them about two miles from the city's outskirts and battled Russian forces in the village of Tolstoy-Yurt, to the north.

Troops pressing from the west heavily shelled the town of Pobedinskoye.

The forces on all fronts made only small advances because of fierce Chechen resistance, the Interfax news agency reported, citing unspecified military officials.

Chechen commanders appeared confident about defending the capital, where guerrillas inflicted severe losses on the Russian army in street fighting during the 1994-96 Chechen war. The Chechens say they have built concrete bunkers and other sturdy defenses.

Chechen Foreign Minister Ilyas Akhmadov played down Russia's attacks, saying Chechnya would fight on and win the war even if Grozny fell.

"Militarily speaking the situation is not dangerous," Akhmadov said in The Hague, Netherlands, after meetings with Dutch Foreign Ministry officials. "We are not fighting a classical war here. Even if we surrender the capital it doesn't mean that we surrender the war."

K-State Men's Glee Club plans performance at McCain Friday

BY LESLIE ELSASSER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Friday's Men's Glee Club concert will not only be the first concert of the semester, but it also will be the first time all members will sing together.

The Men's Glee Club will perform at 7:30 p.m. Friday in McCain Auditorium. Glee club rehearsals are Monday through Thursday, but because of class conflicts not everyone can be there every day, said Brent Schultz, glee club president and junior in management information systems.

"My favorite thing about concerts and an interesting thing is it's the first time the group is at the same place to sing because of the rehearsal schedule," he said. "The concert is a day that everything comes together, and it's the final product of everyone's work to that point."

The concert's music will include jazz, pop and oldies. Signature pieces such as the "Big 12 Medley" also will be performed.

Robyn Unruh, a glee club piano accompanist and junior in elementary education, said her favorite song the glee club will sing is "Silhouettes."

"It's a fun one," she said. "The guys get into it. They have actions that they do. It's very upbeat, and the crowd usually finds it amusing."

Glee club tryouts are in the spring, and there are 55 members. Unruh said most of the members are not music majors, but they are good singers.

"We have a lot of new people in our group who are definitely strong singers," she said. "I think it'll be a fun concert for them because of the addition of their voices to the older ones."

Upcoming concerts include a concert in Nebraska the day before the K-State vs. Nebraska football game, which is an annual event. The Christmas concert will be Dec. 5, and Schultz said group members will travel to New Jersey next semester for the Intercollegiate Men's Chorus Convention. He said Harvard University will participate in that event. However, Schultz said Friday's concert is his priority now.

"I'm excited because it's our first concert," he said. "It's the night before Homecoming, and it's usually a pretty good crowd, and I'm looking forward to just doing it."

"We are seeking competition right now during contract negotiations," Houlihan said.

Dennis Weisman, associate professor of economics, said it is difficult to say what an exclusive-rights contract and a lack of competition on campus would mean to consumers.

Weisman also said a possible deal would force consumers to think about whether the lack of competition would outweigh the university's desire for an exclusive-rights contract and things such as library funding, which are included in a package.

Schellhardt said it is important to consider the ramifications and benefits to students on campus.

"We are looking at the benefits of a deal especially to students, but also to faculty and staff," Schellhardt said.

The decision will affect a variety of people on campus, from the students who could have their drink choices cut in half, to Bill Wisdom, head of Vending Services, and his department.

It is unknown what would happen to Wisdom's department. Schellhardt said if a deal is rendered, the university would want Vending Services employees to be cared for.

Wisdom said morale has been higher in the department, but he said the department is trying not to worry about what might happen.

"The department is certainly apprehensive, and we are going to be more affected than any other department in the university," Wisdom said.

Right now, Wisdom said the employees are struggling as a decision is being rendered.

"You do what you have to do," Wisdom said.

"I think when we realize what is going to happen that it will be a relief to the staff."

Wisdom described the department as a family atmosphere and said the department takes great pride in the fact it always has contributed to the K-State Student Union's budget.

Vending Services was organized in the 1960s to bring organization to the campus' vending policies.

The department has seven full-time employees, and they work eight-hour days to stock campus vending machines.

Wisdom said under the current structure they stock the Pepsi machines, but he said Coca-Cola has its own separate vending service that comes to campus.

"We are all doing our jobs right now," Wisdom said.

"The outcome may or may not be in our favor. Certainly, we have had our ups and downs in the last couple of weeks

Armenian prime minister, 6 others killed in shooting

BY AVET DEMOURIAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

YEREVAN, Armenia — Gunmen seized Armenia's parliament in a torrent of automatic weapons fire Wednesday, killing the prime minister and at least six other people before holing up in the building with dozens of hostages.

With the bodies of some of their victims still on the podium, the attackers, whose motives remained unclear, demanded to see the president.

"They said it was a coup and called on the journalists to inform people about it. They said they were going to punish the authorities for what they did to the nation," said one reporter who was in the chamber.

Armenian television broadcast footage of the stunning attack, showing at least two men in long coats firing automatic weapons in the parliament chamber. Some lawmakers dove under their desks, others fled into the streets.

One of the attackers approached Prime Minister Vazgen Sarkisian and said: "Enough of drinking our blood," according to reporters present during the attack. The premier calmly responded, "Everything is being done for you and the future of your children."

The attacker — identified by reporters as Nairi Unanian, an extreme nationalist and former journalist — opened fire.

The other gunmen included Unanian's brother and uncle, the reporters said.

The attack was likely to plunge Armenia into a political crisis. The country, which became independent following the 1991 collapse of the former Soviet Union, has been plagued by political and economic turmoil for the past decade.

President Clinton said he was shocked and saddened by the attack.

"I condemn the senseless act against individuals actively engaged in building democracy in their country," Clinton said in a statement.

"The victims and their families are in our thoughts and prayers."

Hundreds of police and soldiers ringed the parliament building in central Yerevan. Two armored personnel carriers took up positions in the grounds and President Robert Kocharian was personally directing security operations.

The gunmen were demanding talks with Kocharian, the country's leader, but officials did not say if any other demands had been made. Police said up to five gunmen held dozens of hostages in the main chamber of the parliament building.

A TV cameraman, Gagik Saratikian, who was allowed inside the chamber after the attack, said the gunmen appeared calm, directing him to film scenes in the wrecked hall.

Teaching could earn students free tuition

■ Increase in diversity sparks demand for more instructors.

BY TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students who agree to teach English as a second language in Kansas for two years will receive free tuition at K-State.

With a $2.2 million federal grant, the university is preparing Kansas teachers in 16 rural districts to become endorsed in the ESL program. Socorro Herrera, co-director of the ESL program in the College of Education, said the program is a response to the state's increasingly diverse public school system.

"The demographics in the school system have really changed," she said. "We've had diversity for many years, but we are seeing that diversity grow in rural districts."

The U.S. Department of Education grant will fund scholarships for students in the Bilingual Education Students Interacting To Obtain Success program.

Students in BESITOS, or "little kisses" in Spanish, will receive four years of free tuition, $150 each semester for books and $150 each month for living expenses. Participants must have above a 2.5 grade point average and agree to teach in Kansas for two years after graduation.

Herrera said the greatest need for ESL teachers is in Kansas City, Topeka, Emporia, Garden City and Dodge City.

"There are quite a few students who don't consider going to college, but once that recruiter or mentor is involved, they are more likely to go to college," she said.

The grant also will be used to help nearly 300 teachers become ESL-endorsed in the next five years through distance education. Herrera said it is difficult for many teachers in rural areas to take graduate classes without a nearby university.

BESITOS has 14 students, with 37 expected by next fall. Herrera said she hopes students return to teach in their communities.

"We hope that through lots of contact with the students and the schools, it will be a passion for them," she said.

Pedro Espinoza, senior in education, said he became interested in teaching after being encouraged by high school teachers to enter the profession. He said the program will educate Kansans about different cultures.

"I was planning to go into the major with or without the program, but this has really helped me out a lot," he said. "I was planning to be a teacher, but I wasn't planning on getting my ESL endorsement until later. Now I will be able to get it while I'm here."

Herrera said the programs help the College of Education stay in touch with the needs of students and faculty in the state. She said the college continues to strive for diversity.

"We would love to see educators feel with, rather than for, students. We would also like to see more commitment between the community and the school," she said. "As teachers begin to face the needs many of our students face, that could become a reality."

Residence halls get set for ghosts

■ Students prepare for trick-or-treaters in halls with candy, decorations, work.

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Goblins, witches and ghosts are about to descend on K-State and Manhattan as Halloween quickly approaches this Sunday.

Many are gearing up for the festivities, but one of the largest groups planning celebrations for Halloween are those students who live in the residence halls.

John Dowell, president of Moore Hall and junior in civil engineering, said Moore's largest activity for the holiday is a lobby decorating contest. He said each of the nine floors will decorate its lobby to fit in with the theme of Halloween. Prizes will be awarded to the best-decorated lobby.

"Some floors have silhouettes of witches and werewolves in their windows, while others have decorated the lobby like a forest," Dowell said. "There is a lot of community among floor residents, so this gives them a chance to work together, socialize and have a good time."

Trick-or-treaters, basketball teams' scrimmages among offerings of Fright Night IV

STORY BY NICK BRATKOVIC

Trick-or-treaters came out of the woodwork Thursday night for Fright Night IV.

During the event, Bramlage Coliseum's concourse turned into a trick-or-treat village as children wearing costumes roamed the concourse and collected candy at the different exhibits. An estimated 6,000 fans were in attendance.

Jordan Pranfort, a trick-or-treater from Clyde, Kan., said he attended Fright Night IV to meet his favorite players.

"I liked going and getting the basketball players' autographs," he said. "My favorite player is Tony Kitt."

K-State's Morgen Finneran (left) and Nicky Ramage talk with fans as they sign autographs Thursday night in Bramlage Coliseum. Fright Night IV kicked off the Wildcats' 1999-2000 basketball season.

MIKE SHEPHERD/COLLEGIAN

Men's head coach Tom Asbury said it was nice for his players to get to interact with the crowd.

"The main thing I liked was the Halloween activities," Asbury said. "I know that's the reason we switched over to Fright Night from a Midnight Madness-type deal."

In addition to the men's and women's basketball teams signing autographs on the concourse, members of greek houses, residence halls and other organizations passed out candy to the children.

Sarah Hogancamp, sophomore in psychology, said her sorority and their Homecoming partners spent a lot of time building their exhibit.

"They worked several hours this week, I know," she said.

For Ford and Haymaker halls, along with Smurthwaite and Smith scholarship houses, the work paid off. The Homecoming pairing was awarded a free tailgate party by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. In the greek competition, the Homecoming pairing of Chi Omega, Delta Chi and Phi Gamma Delta also was awarded a tailgating party.

Once the last of the trick-or-treat candy had been passed out, it was time for the show on the court to begin. The men's and women's basketball teams were about to be introduced.

Willie the Wildcat and friends took the court and did a skit resembling scenes from the summer blockbuster "The Sixth Sense." The skit ended with Willie terminating a Kansas Jayhawk mascot.

The women's basketball team then took the floor for its skit.

The skit started with the team searching for Willie the Wildcat. The skit, a parody of "The Wizard of Oz," involved traveling along the Yellow Brick Road freeing different K-State athletes.

"You don't need me — everything you are gonna do is in you," Willie said at the end of the skit.

Card offers chance to receive cash back

■ 20 city businesses included among merchants participating in program.

BY BRYAN SCRIBNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Receiving cash-back benefits on every item purchased at local restaurants, retail and clothing stores might not require cutting coupons or sticking to the sale rack.

The Capitol Card Company, a Topeka-based business owned by Peter Ritchey Jr., is offering an incentive-based discount card aimed at benefiting consumers and business owners.

"The Capitol Card is a loyalty program for businesses and consumers that crosses markets," Ritchey said.

There are 20 Manhattan merchants that distribute the card and offer cash-back benefits. With each purchase, customers who use the card will receive as much as 9-percent cash back.

Most businesses offer 6 3/4-percent savings, but the incentive varies between merchants. To benefit the community, Ritchey said 2 percent of each purchase is allocated to the children of the Optimist Club in Manhattan.

When rebate totals exceed or are equivalent to $8, Ritchey said a check is mailed to consumers at the beginning of the month.

The company tracks benefits accumulated by its customers. A statement of these transactions, along with a company newsletter, is mailed every four months. Ritchey said information provided by this statement is kept confidential.

Although rebates will vary, Ritchey said this program will save consumers money. With few businesses honoring the program in Manhattan, though, Ritchey said he is looking for alternative avenues to market the card.

Sunday morning marks return to standard time

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON , D.C. — Just in time for the tiny goblins to go trick-or-treating, dark will come an hour earlier Sunday with the return of standard time.

Because of the early darkness, safety experts are urging extra caution for drivers and pedestrians.

For one night, the shift will give people an extra hour of sleep as clocks are set back one hour at 2 a.m. Sunday, local time.

The change also moves an hour of darkness to the evening, meaning brighter early mornings.

It also means this is the weekend some people get stuck working an extra hour — factory workers on the overnight shift, all-night convenience store clerks, bartenders, police and even some news reporters.

For most people, though, it simply means having to remember to set the clock back an hour — that's right, back — before retiring Saturday night.

Daylight-saving time returns April 2.

Connection with food theft leads to dispatcher's arrest

SALINA, Kan. — A Kansas Highway Patrol dispatch supervisor was arrested in connection with the theft of about $2,000 worth of merchandise from Dillon's food stores during the past two years.

Jeffrey Weil, 43, of Salina, was suspended from supervising 32 dispatchers at the patrol's communications center in Salina. He is a civilian employee and not a trooper.

Weil, who has worked for the patrol for more than 20 years, was arrested Tuesday by Salina police after about $2,000 of merchandise was recovered. He was released after posting a $1,500 bond.

The thefts from all four Dillon's stores in Salina included mostly movies and health and beauty products, police said.

Coke studies how to make machines adjust soda price

ATLANTA — The Coca-Cola Co. is studying wireless technology that could allow bottlers to raise or lower soda prices by remote control at certain times — say, during hot weather.

Lower prices during periods of slower sales presumably would bring in more business — unless the higher prices at other times enraged customers. A Coca-Cola spokesman said the company has no immediate plans to put such a machine into the marketplace.

"The issue of the pricing is something we don't see happening anytime soon, if ever," spokesman Rob Baskin said Thursday.

"You could probably make a vending machine that could fly, too, but I don't think we would do that."

The New York Times reported Thursday that the company is testing a machine that can raise prices for its drinks automatically during hot weather. It also ran quotes from chairman and chief executive officer M. Douglas Ivester on the subject earlier this month to a Brazilian newsmagazine, Veja.

The desire for a cold drink increases during the summer heat, Ivester said, so "it is fair that it should be more expensive. The machine will simply make this process automatic."

Newpapers object to judge's order to seal court records

MCPHERSON, Kan. — Three Kansas newspapers and the Kansas Press Association have objected to a judge's order sealing court records in a high-profile case of a Lindsborg man accused of killing his three children.

A motion filed Wednesday in McPherson County District Court says the sealing of court records would hinder the newspapers' efforts to inform the public.

The three newspapers are the Hutchinson News, Salina Journal and Wichita Eagle.

McPherson County District Court Judge Carl B. Anderson ordered lawyers in the case to file all motions directly with his office instead of the district court clerk's office and instructed attorneys not to release any court documents to the news media. Anderson said he wanted to review all motions before releasing them.

Christopher E. Jones, 46, is accused of killing his 2-, 5-, and 7-year-old children Oct. 6 and attacking his wife. Prosecutors from the Kansas Attorney General's office charged him with three counts of first-degree murder in the children's deaths and one count of aggravated battery for an alleged attack on his wife, Catherine Jones.

MIT fraternity loses license because of drinking charges

BOSTON — An MIT fraternity accused of serving alcohol to an underage Wellesley College student lost its dormitory license Thursday.

The city Licensing Board gave residents of the off-campus Sigma Alpha Epsilon house until Nov. 15 to find new lodging.

"They have to be told they aren't children anymore," chairman Daniel Pokaski said. "I don't think they even have a clue."

Services planned for K-State glass blower

BY KEVIN SELDERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mitsugi Ohno, the former K-State senior master glass blower whose artistic glass sculptures can be seen throughout campus, died Oct. 22.

The funeral will be at 2:30 p.m. today at All Faiths Chapel, with a visitation at 1:30 pm.

Ohno became internationally known for his scale-model glass replicas of famous buildings and warships and the netting technique he used to make them.

"There is no other person in the world that did the same type of work," Duy Hua, professor of chemistry, said.

Ohno's work can be found in many notable locations, including the White House, the Smithsonian Institution, the Eisenhower Museum and the Imperial Palace in Japan. The majority of his work, however, was donated to K-State over the years.

Along with many warship replicas, Ohno donated sculptures of McCain Auditorium, Anderson Hall and Cardwell Hall.

Although Ohno could spend close to 2,200 hours producing a sculpture, his personal philosophy was to give the sculptures away as gifts.

"He wouldn't accept any money," Hua said. "He believed all artwork you do is not for money but for self-satisfaction."

Cliff Meloan, professor emeritus of analytical chemistry, has similar memories of Ohno's generosity.

"He thought the joy of it was giving it away as a gift," Meloan said.

The sculptures can be seen in McCain, the Chemistry/Biochemistry Building and the K-State Student Union.

Although Ohno was renowned for his artistic glass-blowing, his scientific glass-blowing is what initially won him respect.

"His main love was scientific glassware," Meloan said. "The artistic kind happened by accident."

Mitsugi Ohno holds one of his partially completed glass ships. His cancer kept him from creating the blown-glass structures. Ohno died Oct. 22. His funeral will be at 2:30 p.m. today at All Faiths Chapel, with a visitation at 1:30 p.m.

Ohno's 60-year devotion to glass-blowing started at the age of 13 in Tokyo.

In 1947, he started working as a glass-blower for the Department of Chemistry at Tokyo University. Glass-blowing is beneficial for chemistry because it can produce unusual glassware for laboratory research.

Ohno was brought to K-State in 1961 by Meloan and Alvin Cardwell, former head of the Department of Physics. Cardwell recognized Ohno's ability to work with glass and believed it would be beneficial to the chemistry department.

Ohno's years of devotion to the chemistry department resulted in him being appointed senior glass blower in 1990.

Meloan said Ohno could hand-make a three-stage oil diffusion pump, which can sell for about $2,500, for the department in about three days.

A memorial fund has been established with the KSU Foundation for the Mitsugi Ohno Scholarship Fund to benefit the Department of Chemistry.

"This is the true value of this type of person at a university," Meloan said.

Ohno in turn valued his years at K-State, Meloan said.

"He loved it," he said. "K-State gave him the opportunity to come to this country and demonstrate his skills, and he was forever grateful for it."

Ohno retired in 1996 to devote more time to his artistic glass-blowing.

Among those he worked with, Ohno's work ethic will be remembered as much as the results it produced.

"He was a very patient man," Jim Hodgson, senior master glass blower, said. "He'd show you something over and over if you asked him to."

Meloan said Ohno's personality carried over outside the chemistry department as well.

"He was the kind of person most people would want to be — honest. He never cheated you, and he would shoot for perfection on everything he did," Meloan said. "He would take the extra time to do things the right way."

Mail routes offer chance to find job

■ Rural carrier associates fill in for regular deliverers.

BY KELLEE MILLER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kent Williams, 39, spends his Saturdays driving 107 miles, filling in on someone else's day off.

This rural mail route takes him about 9 hours, which includes sorting the mail and then driving the route, he said.

"It pretty much takes up the whole day," he said.

He said the winter weather adds some difficulty to the job.

"The winter weather is always fun to see if you can make it around without going into a ditch," he said.

Williams, who lives south of Olsburg, Kan., is one of eight rural carrier associates for the Manhattan Post Office who fill in on the regular rural carriers' days off, during the carrier's annual leave or if the carrier is on sick leave. These associates usually work only one day a week unless they are filling in during the carrier's annual leave, Postmaster Marvin Roth said.

He said rural carrier associates are part-time employees who do not earn benefits and are paid by the hour. If vacancies for a career position come up, they will be offered to the RCAs after at least one year of continuous service.

Roth said there is always the chance they will be offered a career position. He said there are several opportunities, especially if many carriers around the same age decide to retire at the same time.

"We haven't had a vacancy here for the last four years," he said.

Williams is one of the associates who was offered an extra position, which gives him more benefits, such as some annual and sick leave. He has had an auxiliary route, which is slightly shorter than a regular route, for about four years.

This route takes about 4 1/2 hours and is only 26 miles long, he said. When he fills in on the regular carrier's route, someone has to fill in for him on his auxiliary route.

RCAs must apply for the position at the post office and then take a test, Roth said. Based on that score, they are put in order on a roster — the roster order determines who will be interviewed first. However, Williams said the process was different when he applied 15 years ago.

"Years ago the regular carrier could pick their regular substitute," he said.

He said a friend approached him about the job, and he decided to do it in order to get more work hours. He said he asked himself on the first day on the route, "What am I doing here?"

"It's tough starting out," Williams said, but he also said it gets easier after the route is learned.

Later, Williams did take the now-required test in order to be placed on the roster for a career position.

"The test has changed a lot since then," he said.

Roth compared the test to the ACT or SAT test but said it wasn't quite that hard.

"No one knows what's on it if they haven't taken it or been the person who gives it," he said.

The most difficult thing about being an associate, he said, is having to be there when they call you to fill in. He said it's hard when one is working another job.

"A lot of employers aren't willing to let you off," he said.

However, it is convenient for people who are self-employed or have an understanding boss, he said.

Roth said RCAs typically find it fits with their other work.

"Most of them, if it works with the other work they do, will stay for awhile," he said. "We had some here for quite awhile."

The Manhattan Post Office is taking applications for associates, and Roth said it probably will need one to three more this year. He said the post office has not received as many applications in the past couple of years due to the current state of the job market.

"We haven't been getting as many as we used to," he said.

Applications must be postmarked by today and can be picked up at the Manhattan Post Office.

Governor, media main fools in Ramsey case

JonBenet Ramsey's death in 1996 was tragic. Even more tragic is that the killer or killers have yet to be caught. The biggest tragedy, however, is that the media will not let her case rest. They refuse to let it go, because JonBenet was a beautiful little princess. Had she died an ugly child of poor parents, her death would not be receiving the kind of publicity it has garnered to date.

A lack of publicity would be for the best for the politicians, policemen, her parents and their friends involved with the case. So far, it has made almost all of them look like bumbling idiots. The police, first to gain bumbling-idiot status, failed to separate JonBenet's parents, John and Patsy Ramsey, at the crime scene to question them. The bumbling continued with friends of the Ramseys accusing Patsy or John or both for JonBenet's murder. John and Patsy virtually refuse to cooperate with police. However, the most recent idiot has been Colorado Gov. Bill Owens.

At a Wednesday press conference, he told reporters he would not appoint a special prosecutor for the case. Unfortunately, that isn't all he said. He made veiled threats to JonBenet's parents, telling them to "work with (police) to find the killers in this case — no matter where that trail may lead." He alluded that the trail just might stop on their doorstep.

The problem with Owens' veiled threats is they come dangerously close to damaging any future case against the Ramseys — if enough evidence exists at some point for that step. Legal analysts for the networks are saying that if the Ramseys ever are charged with the crime, the governor's comments could be used as fuel for change of venue and later for mistrial, should they be convicted.

For a case that just needs to crawl in a hole far, far away from the public eye, that is bad news. If and when a trial happens, we'll all be subjected to more JonBenet coverage than we can stand.

Barbaric horror of gruesome partial-birth abortions must be stopped

Scott RONEY

"I stood at the doctor's side and watched him perform a partial-birth abortion on a woman who was six months pregnant. The baby's heartbeat was clearly visible on the ultrasound screen. The doctor delivered the baby's body and arms, everything but his little head. The baby's body was moving. His little fingers were clasping together. He was kicking his feet. The doctor took a pair of scissors and inserted them into the back of the baby's head, and the baby's arms jerked out in a flinch, a startle reaction, like a baby does when he thinks that he might fall. Then the doctor opened the scissors up. Then he stuck the high-powered suction tube into the hole and sucked the baby's brains out. Now the baby was completely limp. ... I am still haunted by the face of that little boy." — Brenda Pratt Shafer, registered nurse, in her testimony before a Senate committee.

The procedure that Shafer observed is legal in just more than half of the United States, up to the moment before birth. In fact, though precise figures are hard to come by due to lack of complete reporting, between 6,000 to 13,000 babies have their brains sucked out after being partially delivered each year in the United States. It is important to note that the only difference between partial-birth abortion and infanticide is the three or four inches of the baby's head remaining in the birth canal.

On Oct. 21, the U.S. Senate passed a bill banning this gruesome practice. Among the bill's supporters were numerous senators who never before had cast a pro-life vote in their entire political career. Unfortunately, not enough senators could figure out whether infanticide was wrong, so the bill passed four votes shy of the two-thirds majority needed to override an almost-certain Clinton veto.

President Clinton now has vetoed bills to prevent the killing of almost-born babies three times. Purportedly, this is because they lack a "health of the mother" exemption. This is despite the fact that abortionists themselves, including Dr. Martin Haskell, who is a leading proponent of the procedure, have testified that there is never any medical reason whatsoever to deliver a baby almost completely and then kill it.

Furthermore, every single bill nevertheless has included an exception allowing partial-birth abortion if the mother's life is in danger.

It also is important to understand what the term "health" legally means. Health includes emotional or psychological health, which means that with a health exemption, it becomes OK or a woman to kill her baby if she doesn't like morning sickness, is slightly stressed about the pregnancy or is merely worried about the way she looks being pregnant. In other words, this exemption actually is a loophole big enough for an elephant.

Why is it, then, that Clinton and 34 senators are so committed to ensuring that no one stops an abortionist from murdering a baby that is 90-percent born and, in most cases, viable outside the womb?

This issue raises some other, deeper questions. If it is wrong to kill a baby who already is born, and it is wrong to kill a baby in the process of being born, why is it OKs to kill a baby up to the moment before it is born? At what precise point in the birth canal is a "lifeless glob of tissue"—as abortion proponents claim — magically transformed into a human being, a person with full rights under the law? If it is illegal to kill a baby outside the womb, why is it legal to kill a baby within the womb? This is akin to making a law that it is illegal for a man to beat his children outside their home, but that it is perfectly legal for him to treat them as brutally as he wants within their house.

Even those who would otherwise approve of some abortions should see that there is no excuse for allowing partial-birth abortion. Our Declaration of Independence and the 14th Amendment guarantee the right to life of all innocent people, regardless of age or place of residence (inside or outside the womb). When are the lawmakers in Topeka and Gov. Bill Graves going to put a stop to partial birth abortions in Kansas? People come to Wichita from all over the United States and even foreign countries for partial-birth abortions of late-term babies, babies large enough to live outside the womb.

This barbaric horror has gone on too long already. It is past time we acknowledged that infanticide is wrong. It is past time to end partial-birth abortion.

Online book purchase small step in technological evolution

Apryl MATHES

My grandpa opened his birthday present from my little brothers first. However, my mom does the shopping for all holiday occasions and my brothers generally just sign their names on the card, usually without any knowledge of what is inside the wrapped package. So, my brothers' faces were just as blank as Grandpa's as he tore into the package, revealing a devotional journal, which he received well. Next came my parents, who decided to go all-out and presented Grandpa with a leather-bound Bible. It even had his name on it.

That left me. Grandpa opened my card and discovered, with a cry of delight, that he was going to be receiving, in three to five days, a book from amazon.com. I got him a book on the greatest moments from "The Young and the Restless," complete with pictures. I suggested that he alternate between passages in the New Testament and reading the book about soap opera trash.

My parents looked at me like I was the antichrist, but after all, "The Young and the Restless" is Grandpa's favorite soap opera. And amazon.com saved my butt since I had forgotten to get anything for his birthday, and I either was going to have to go online or stop at the Walgreens right by my house and get him the Brut gift pack.

It was my first online purchase, although I wouldn't consider myself an Internet neophyte by any means. However, I usually reserved my online time for checking out my e-mail or surfing the mullet Web site.

My youngest brother, Brett, on the other hand, is quite the e-commerce pro. He ordered a horse off the Internet. I'm not sure how or why, but I do know that a trailer pulled up our driveway last year with a horse postmarked to the Mathes family. Cracker Jack, as she came to be called, was tethered out in the front lawn for a while before we could make arrangements.

Did I say a horse? We actually ended up with two horses. Cracker Jack was knocked up.

In fact, when I was whining about how I had to make a Web page for one of my classes, Brett, with all the wisdom of a 13 year-old, put his arm around me and reminded me that he'd been making Web pages since sixth grade. His latest is called "The Horse Page," as a tribute to his mare. He offers a hearty welcome to horse lovers everywhere, and a special greeting to all the horses that have been abused.

As far as computer skills go, I think I'm somewhere in between Brett and my roommate, Mindy. I was trying to help her out with her statistics homework on Excel, and I told her to minimize the screen. She got that deer-in-the-headlights look.

"Minimize?"

For the love. I suggested that she contact Brian Kovar for a remedial computer course.

In the meantime, my little brother, with all of his computer prowess, apparently got kicked off America On-Line for (allegedly) downloading porn. He maintains his innocence. At least no more barnyard animals will be making surprise appearances at our house for awhile.

To only a relatively few students,

I hope that some day, when you grow up, you will spend your hard-earned money buying a house and decorating it nicely with Halloween and Christmas decorations, and then have some pea-brained idiot steal or vandalize your hard work.

Population-police idea unoriginal; Communists beat columnist to it

Editor,

I share Erin Schneweis' concern about the welfare of children. I, too, believe procreation licenses should be required by law in order for potential parents to have offspring, and I laud her bold stance on the issue. Indeed, perhaps we could set up a large governmental bureaucracy to prevent people from having unauthorized children. Maybe we could have "population police" to ensure that no unsanctioned hanky-panky occurs behind closed doors. Better yet, let's set up a security network in people's homes to see exactly who is doing things that could lead to contraband infants.

In short, the idea is a brilliant one. I feel, however, that I must give credit where credit is due. You see, Schneweis is not the first one to suggest we tamper with reproductive rights. The true pioneers in that field were those visionaries who ruled Communist China. Nice try, Schneweis.

Creator of masks to present live skits Sunday at McCain

The masks in McCain Auditorium on Halloween won't be scary.

Michael Cooper will present a series of live skits titled "Masked Marvels and Wondertales," said Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer of McCain.

"He has created all these elaborate masks," Jackson said. "Some took 300 to 400 hours to build. None of them are scary."

The vignettes are designed to teach some sort of lesson, Jackson said.

For instance, Cooper conveys the fresh outlook of babies by reenacting a birth. This vignette was inspired by the birth of Cooper's own child, Jackson said.

"Cooper presents the show with stories through music, classic fables and his own original themes," Jackson said. "It's quite a wonderful thing for students and children of all ages to enjoy."

Cooper will perform at 3 p.m. Sunday.

Jackson said the show provides an alternative Halloween activity, but it is scheduled early enough in the afternoon that traditional activities need not be forfeited.

Tickets can be purchased at the McCain box office from noon to 5 p.m. today.

Ticket prices for the show are $12 for adults, $10 for senior citizens and $6 for students and children.

Tickets also can be purchased at the door.

Blue Angels jet crashes in Georgia; 2 killed

BY ELLIOTT MINOR
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOODY AIR FORCE BASE, Ga. — A jet from the Navy's Blue Angels precision flying team crashed during a training flight Thursday while trying to land under clear skies. Both people aboard were killed.

The F/A-18 Hornet went down around midday on a farm near Moody Air Force Base in southernmost Georgia, plowing into a stand of pines. The Blue Angels were scheduled to perform at the base this weekend.

"They were coming in to land, practicing arrival maneuvers, when this happened," said Pentagon spokesman Ken Bacon in Washington, D.C. "We don't know what caused it."

Beverly Peters of Douglas said she saw the team fly over a grocery store where she was shopping.

"They came over in a beautiful formation. I think there were six of them," she said. "It was probably a half an hour later that we saw the smoke. I didn't hear a crash or anything. Someone said they must be burning garbage. Then a little while later, the fire trucks came by. It was just a big, black billowing."

> "I didn't hear a crash or anything. Someone said they must be burning garbage."

> — Beverly Peters, witness

The precision flying team, based in Pensacola, Fla., has six F/A-18 Hornets that execute high-speed acrobatics. Several stunts involve the jets moving in tight formation, such as the four-plane diamond maneuver and the six-jet delta.

Since the Blue Angels were formed in 1946, the group has performed for more than 322 million people.

Including Thursday's deaths, 23 Blue Angels pilots have been killed in air shows or training.

The last crash involving the squad was in 1990. The last death was in 1985, in Niagara Falls, N.Y. Lt. Cmdr. Michael Gershon was killed when two planes collided during an air show.

"Obviously, if any sort of procedural or maintenance problems are revealed by the investigation, they will be addressed aggressively by the Navy," Bacon said.

"This is its premier flying team, a team that performs to the amazement and pleasure of crowds all over the United States, and you can be sure the Navy will do whatever it can to make sure that this team is at the very top of its ability to fly."

Researchers take step toward cancer drug

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Researchers at Harvard Medical School have found the first of a new class of proteins that block cell division. The discovery eventually could lead to a new type of cancer drug.

In a study to be published today in the journal Science, Harvard scientist Tim Mitchison and Stuart Schrieber describe discovery of a molecule that disrupts a key step in the process of cell division.

The compound, called monastrol, blocks cell division in a different way from many of the current cancer drugs, the researchers said.

Mitchison said in a statement that the discovery represents a potential starting point for developing better chemotherapeutics against cancer.

Golf team prepares for match

BY KELLI ALLIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The format of the Diet Coke/Roadrunner Invitational in Las Cruces, N.M., is a little different from normal matches for the K-State women's golf team.

Instead of playing 36 holes the first day and 18 the last, 18 holes are played each day. The Wildcats will play for three days instead of two.

"It is a change of pace," Coach Kristi Knight said. "We enjoy the option to play 18 holes and have a chance to go practice on the range or putting green. It isn't quite of a hectic schedule. Still intense and tough, but more of a relaxed schedule."

The relaxed schedule allows the team members to make adjustments in their game if needed.

"I really like it, because if you struggle on the first day, you have time to regroup," sophomore Edie Murdoch said. "You have time to be prepared."

Traci Benninga said playing 18 holes a day has its advantages and disadvantages.

"I do like three days of 18, even mentally, it is nice to know you won't be out there all day long," Benninga said. "But with 36 and then 18, it is one less day of class you miss. So, it has its positives and negatives."

Murdoch has another positive aspect for playing in New Mexico: She is from there, so her family will get to come to watch her.

"It will be nice to have some familiar faces watching me," Murdoch said.

Because the competition is taking place in New Mexico, the course is a little different from other courses the team plays.

"The desert brings in a different factor," Knight said. "Hit some shots off the tee, and they can end up in the desert. It gives us some challenges that we don't really see anywhere else. "

The Wildcats who will travel to Las Cruces, about 40 minutes northwest of El Paso, Texas, are freshmen Miranda Smith and Elise Carpentier, sophomores Murdoch and Lindsay Hammerschmidt and Benninga, a junior.

The team will be facing a tough field for its final tournament of the fall season. There are more than 20 teams, and most of the Big 12 schools will be there, including Texas Tech, Texas A&M, Oklahoma, Oklahoma State and Colorado.

Among the non-Big 12 schools are New Mexico State and New Mexico, which Knight said both could be in the top 15 or 20.

"Outside of the Big 12 Preview," Knight said, "it is the toughest field we face."

Murdoch said she wants the team to end the fall season on a good note that carries over to the spring.

"I think the whole team is looking for ending on a positive note," Murdoch said. "Mentally, we would have confidence going into the spring season, if we have a good tournament."

Knight said she wants the team to leave the tournament with confidence.

"It will improve team confidence to have a good finish," Knight said. "If we had a good tournament, the girls could say we had a good fall season. That way, their most recent competition memory is a positive one."

Women's cross country team tries to edge its way to top

BY SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 7 K-State women's cross country team will defend its Big 12 title this weekend in the conference meet at College Station, Texas.

No. 4 Colorado appears to be the Cats' main competition.

The Cats won the league meet last year, led by Korene Hinds, a senior this year. Head coach Randy Cole said Hinds and freshman Amy Mortimer must carry a lot of weight as the top-two runners on the team.

"We need to have our top two women put pressure on their first runner and getting ahead of their second runner," Cole said. "That's going to be key. They have to be close to Colorado's front-runner, Kara Wheeler. That would be one of the favorites to win the race, but Amy and Korene are capable of being close to her."

Mortimer said she is capable of pressuring Wheeler but said it is hard to predict what will happen when it comes down to race time.

"I just have to run a smart race, make sure I have something left for the last half of the race," Mortimer said. "It's kind of hard to say what will happen. It will depend on how the race unfolds. When you're in the race, you have to adjust your strategy."

Cole said he anticipates the meet to be a battle between K-State and Colorado. Although the top runners are key, the rest of the team must step up as well.

"Our third, fourth and fifth runners have the key battle to beat their third, fourth and fifth, and that's pretty much it," Cole said. "Placing all our runners in the top 15 or 20, it's almost like a man to man. Pick them out of the field, and go get them and get ahead of them."

Sophomore Ekaterini Fotopoulou has fallen from her spot as the third runner on the team in recent meets because of illness and not being able to practice at full strength. Cole said she has been practicing harder in the past two weeks and should be better prepared this weekend.

Mortimer said this will help the team.

"That will definitely help, because at the beginning of the season she was our third runner and then she dropped to fifth," Mortimer said. "If she can pull up, that will give us fewer points and make us a lot stronger."

On the men's side of the meet, the favorite is Colorado, the only Big 12 team ranked in the top 25. Cole said it again will be a matter of the top two runners running to the best of their ability.

"It's going to be, for us, our top-two guys Brandon (Jessop) and Jean-Paul (Niyongabo) getting up in the top 10, which is very likely, and then our other guys are going to have to step it up and get in the top 40."

The meet could be close beyond Colorado, Cole said, as there are not as many favorites as the women's side.

"It's going to be a close race from a team placing second, third, fourth, all the way to seventh," Cole said. "Every point counts. Every person passed in the meet counts and could mean a couple team points. It could be that close."

The Cats, who did not compete last weekend, have had an extra week of rest. Cole said this is key to the development of athletes throughout the season and provides an edge this weekend.

"They were able to recover and get a couple good, sharp workouts in and just kind of tuneup for the meet, recover from the trip to Indiana and all the travel," Cole said.

"Sometimes, the travel just wears you down as much as the race. I think racing every other weekend allows you to race hard, and then have some time to rebuild, then you can progress. Racing every weekend kind of wears you down."

Volleyball team attempts to get back on winning track against Nebraska

BY IVAN KOZAR
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State volleyball team lost Wednesday night for the second time in three matches, being upset by Texas Tech in a tough five-game match.

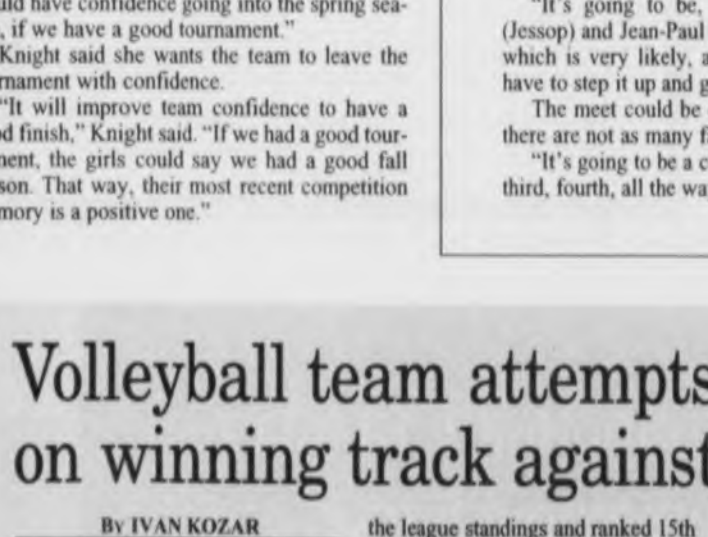
However, the team can't dwell on the loss, because No. 13 Nebraska is on its way to Manhattan for a 7 p.m. match Saturday.

The Wildcats (15-4 overall, 9-2 Big 12) had come into the match atop the league standings and ranked 15th in the country.

"They were a lot better than when we played them the first time," head coach Jim McLaughlin said of Texas Tech. "I think they did a very good job of serving, and they kept a lot of pressure on us over the five-game match and disrupted our rhythm."

In the first meeting of the season, the Cats traveled to Lincoln and became only the third team in Big 8/Big 12 history to beat the Huskers (15-5, 7-3) on their home court, where they are 142-3.

The Huskers had 25 blocks to the Cats' 12.5 and 96 kills to K-State's 80. However, Nebraska committed 13 service errors and seven receiving errors in dropping three of five games in the match.



As the second half of the season starts, the Cats look to improve on their play.

"I'd like to be in a little bit better of a rhythm, we need to get that back. I think a big part of that is getting the right repetitions," McLaughlin said. "The girls are playing hard, we just have to upgrade on quality of play, and we've got to think about handling the ball at a high level."

The Cornhuskers are led by junior outside hitter Nancy Meendering, who has 351 kills on the year and averages 4.88 kills a game. Meendering also was featured on the front cover of this month's Volleyball Magazine and has recorded three 30-kill matches this season.

The Cats will be hoping for a record crowd Saturday as they attempt to move up in the attendance rankings. The Cats are sixth in the country in attendance, averaging 2,210 fans a match.

"I hope we have a huge crowd. The crowd will help us, and we will be fired up," McLaughlin said.

Music collection offers advice for football stars; Irvin, Young should 'Give It Up' while they can

MIKE VIETTI

As I was thumbing through my batch of late '80s and early '90s cassette singles the other day (don't even ask why), I came across the old Public Enemy song, "Give It Up."

I know, I know — you think the song should apply to me and my columns, but there actually are a couple of other people the song applies to besides white rappers, as the song indicates.

Steve Young and Michael Irvin.

A few weeks ago against Philadelphia, Irvin found himself lying on the turf with a temporary loss of feeling in his arms and legs. On Wednesday, Irvin found out he has a spinal condition in which his spinal canal is narrower than average. With the smaller area, Irvin's spinal cord is at a greater risk.

I think it's time for Irvin to heed Chuck D's words. What else does he have left to accomplish? He's got two Super Bowl rings, seven 1,000-yard receiving seasons, almost 12,000 career yards and 62 touchdown catches.

What is he going to prove by trying to play again? The answer in my book is stupidity. It's not the same situation as a Dan Marino, who has had more operations on his knees than Pamela Anderson Lee has had on her breasts.

A knee isn't the same thing as a spinal cord — if Irvin took another hit, perhaps one that wouldn't affect the average NFL player, he might not walk again.

I understand the need to compete and to win, but is it worth not walking again to win another Super Bowl? I sincerely hope not.

Believe it or not, Young's situation is even worse. Perhaps we could use "Don't Stop (Thinking About Tomorrow)" by Fleetwood Mac for him. Young has had four concussions in the past three years.

One could be a fluke. Two — maybe a coincidence. Three — Steve, you should have retired. Four — Steve, you're a lucky, lucky man. Again, what does he have to prove?

He's got one Super Bowl ring, more than 33,000 passing yards, 232 touchdown passes and the highest quarterback rating in NFL history at 96.8.

The 49ers are different from the Cowboys in that San Francisco is finished competing for a Super Bowl for the next few years. The 49ers don't have a chance, because the salary cap is killing them. The team seemingly had to dump half of its roster in the off-season just to get under the cap this year, and that's a trend that will continue for the next few years.

Young already is 38 years old, and despite the fact that several doctors have given him unfavorable opinions as to whether he should play again, he still is pursing the idea. Why?

I know you're a lawyer, Steve, and I know you graduated with all sorts of honors at Brigham Young, but I think I'm gonna side with the doctors on this one.

One of those doctors said Young needs to rest in order "to allow his brain to recover." What else more does a doctor need to say? "Play again, get hit in the head again, and you're dead?" Would that work?

Nothing has yet. Even 49ers head coach Steve Mariucci said he would have trouble sending Young onto the field for fear of what could happen to him.

Steve and Michael, you both have had great careers, you are both sure Hall of Famers, but the game, for both of your sakes, doesn't want either of you anymore.

There comes a time when a line must be drawn, and that time is now. The NFL needs to step up and refuse to allow players in cases like this the opportunity to play football.

Retire, enjoy your families (or cocaine and prostitutes, in Irvin's case), but it's time to stop the nonsense, guys.

Michael, take a little listen to Fleetwood Mac's "Don't Stop (Thinking About Tomorrow.)"

Steve, expand your horizons and listen to Public Enemy's "Give It Up."

Who knows? Maybe that's all each of them needed.

Senate votes to support joining service program

BY LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A resolution in support of K-State joining Campus Compact was approved unanimously by Student Senate on Thursday night.

Campus Compact is a nationwide organization of college and university presidents promoting community service and civic participation. It also provides scholarships, fellowships, research grants and other services to students and faculty.

Student Body President Jason Heinrich said he first heard of the organization when he attended a leadership conference, LeaderShape, in Illinois.

"LeaderShape challenges you to come up with a vision," Heinrich said. "I wanted my vision to involve service. I felt that was my mission as student body president."

Heinrich said Campus Compact fulfills his vision and can have a huge effect on higher education in Kansas.

Susan Scott, associate dean of student life, wrote in a letter read to Senate that joining Campus Compact would take public and community service to the next step.

Heinrich said he agrees. He said students would be more aware of their civil duties because service learning would be incorporated into the curriculum.

The resolution will be presented to President Jon Wefald on Wednesday in hopes of his support and financial backing. The cost of joining Campus Compact is $2,530. Heinrich said Wefald's support could help launch not only K-State's membership into the organization, but other Kansas colleges and universities' memberships. There are only two Kansas members of the organization, University of Kansas and Newman University.

Senate also passed a bill allocating $840 to the Project Management Institute.

A resolution concerning changes to the Fine Arts Council was introduced, and final action will be taken next Thursday.

A forum between the council and the Allocations and Privilege Fee committees will take place at 5 p.m. Monday in the Union Big 12 Room to discuss final changes to the resolution.

Voting on an emergency allocation to University Counseling Services also will be Thursday.

Drug-resistant TB has spread to 104 countries, study finds

BY BETH J. HARPAZ
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Drug-resistant tuberculosis has been found in 104 countries and could spread to every nation unless $1 billion is devoted to controlling it, according to a study released Thursday.

The report was commissioned by philanthropist George Soros and conducted by Harvard Medical School.

Russian prisons are among the epicenters of the hard-to-treat and potentially fatal disease. About 100,000 inmates have active TB and about 40 percent have drug-resistant TB, said Gen. Vladimir Yalinin, the chief of prisons.

About 30,000 people with active cases are released from prison in Russia each year, and 400 prison workers have developed TB, he said through a translator at a news conference in New York.

"These epidemics are only briefly local," said Dr. Paul Farmer, a professor of social medicine at Harvard and author of the report. "They will not remain within prisons — they will not remain within national borders."

TB is the leading infectious cause of death among adults worldwide, killing up to 2 million people every year.

Eight million people are infected each year.

The report identified TB hotspots — countries where at least 5 percent of all TB cases are drug-resistant. The highest percentage of drug-resistant TB cases were found in Latvia at 22 percent.

"These epidemics are only briefly local. They will not remain within prisons — they will not remain within national borders."

— Dr. Paul Farmer, author of report

Latvia was followed by the Delhi state in India, Estonia, the Henan province of China, the Dominican Republic, Argentina, the Ivanovo region of Russia and the Ivory Coast.

The study says a TB strategy successfully implemented in New York City in the mid-1990s — deploying health workers to watch patients take each and every dose — is the only way to cure the disease and stop the proliferation of drug-resistant strains.

While the approach used in New York City required less than a year of treatment for each case, new strains of multi-drug-resistant TB might require up to two years of complex treatment, costing anywhere from several hundred dollars to several thousand per patient.

Many countries lack the funding, personnel and public health infrastructure to implement such an intensive method of treatment.

The report predicted the disease will spread across the globe unless $1 billion worth of resources is devoted to controlling it.

The report also suggests that physicians in many countries are improperly prescribing TB drugs, contributing to the problem.

The disease is airborne and can be spread through contact as casual as sitting on the same airplane with someone who is infected.

Entomology expert examines bugs for curious

■ Diagnostician receives many insects for perusal.

BY MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Robert Bowling is an expert on unidentified flying objects, creeping, crawling objects and any other bugs sent to him by curious people.

Bowling, the K-State Division of Cooperative Extension entomology insect diagnostician, spends his time examining and identifying insects sent to him by both the concerned and the curious.

"The reason most people send in bugs is probably curiosity, but also if there's something that will damage the structure of their house or pose health concerns," Bowling said.

Most of the insects submitted do not cause problems. People simply are uneasy about finding bugs in their house or food, Bowling said.

"Most insects found in foodstuffs are not health problems," Bowling said. "People are just squeamish. If they see an insect in their food, they don't want to eat it, but if it's cooked there is no effect on human health. Roaches, however, can carry diseases."

People sometimes go to great lengths to show Bowling their discoveries.

"One woman drew a picture of a caterpillar she saw on a mailbox," Bowling said. "It could've been anything. The drawing was large, and she was saying it was the actual size of the insect. She wanted me to identify the drawing. Another woman carried a large piece of firewood up three flights of stairs because she thought it might have termites. Actually, material had collected in the wood and started to decay."

The misconceptions surrounding insects are one reason Bowling said he has a special affinity for the wasp, which actually helps crops by paralyzing other bugs that cause harm.

"Most people tend to have a healthy respect for wasps because of the potential for stings," Bowling said.

Bowling said he became fascinated with bugs at an early age, and he has carried that interest into his career.

"Insects have always fascinated me ... I became interested in entomology as a profession"

— Robert Bowling, insect diagnostician

"Insects have always fascinated me," Bowling said. "As a small child I would look at caterpillars on trees. As a crop consultant, I would scout for insects, and I became interested in entomology as a profession."

Now that he's a professional entomologist, Bowling said he not only identifies insects but recommends how to get rid of them if they pose a problem. The method of bug removal Bowling said he prefers is vacuuming them and dumping the bag outside. He said he rarely recommends insecticides.

"Insecticides are fine, but they're usually not warranted," Bowling said. "Unless a pesticide control operator is doing the application, it can be harmful if applied by the home owner."

To keep the insects out of the house in the first place, caulking and weather stripping should be used to seal cracks in the house or apartment. To eliminate entry through vents, an aluminum window screen should be placed over the vents, Bowling said.

If people want an insect identified, they can put it in a jar and take it to the Insect Diagnostic Lab in the Department of Entomology for an immediate examination. Insects also can be mailed if they are placed inside a vial with alcohol and then placed in a crush-proof box. Information on where the insect was found, how many were found and the submitter's concerns should be included with the bug, Bowling said.

"We welcome people to bring in samples."

Michael Nawrocki, graduate student in veterinary medicine, is interviewed by host Mary Renee Smith during the opening show for "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" in the K-State Student Union in 1997. Before the show, participants were judged for best costume. Nawrocki, dressed as a proctologist, won the competition.

ROCKY horror RIOT

Audience-interaction film to focus on costumes, virgin auction, food throwing

BY NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Toast and newspaper being hurled at the screen, shouting cross-dressers and a virgin auction.

It's time for the another showing of "The Rocky Horror Picture Show."

The 10th-annual showing of "Rocky Horror," co-sponsored by the Union Program Council's Feature Film and Kaleidoscope Film committies, will take place at midnight Saturday in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

The movie is a musical sci-fi comedy about a young couple (Barry Bostwick and Susan Sarandon) who stumble upon a mansion owned by a transvestite scientist (Tim Curry) who's creating the ultimate sex toy, Rocky (Peter Hinwood), for himself, said Paul Donovan, program adviser for the UPC films committees.

"It's really famous. Several hundred people show up," Donovan said. "A lot of people know the words by heart."

Starting the event will be a costume contest with prizes to be awarded. The pre-show events will begin at 11:30 p.m.

"People who do well in the contest are dressed as parts from the movie," Michael Rottinghaus, Feature Films chairman, said. "But all costumes are welcomed."

Donovan said most people come dressed either in drag or as various characters from the movie.

"You can dress in drag and not be considered a freak," Donovan said.

After the costume contest, there will be a virgin auction, in which people in the audience who have never seen the film before, or have never seen it in an audience setting, are taken up front and auctioned off to more experienced viewers in the audience.

"It initiates them to the scene," Rottinghaus said.

The virgins go to the highest bidders, and their fate is then determined by the one who bid them.

Bags of goodies are handed out to audience members so that they might have objects to launch at the screen at the right cues.

Donovan said people who have seen the movie before will know the cues for when and what to throw, and that it is easy to catch on for those who have not seen it. The bag of goodies includes rice, cards, a newspaper and toast.

"People that really know the show will get up and act with the movie, or do their own scripts that go along with the movie up in front of the screen," Donovan said.

Donovan said the show normally has a turnout of about 300-500 people, and this year he expects around 400.

"We get a good turnout for it. People really like the audience participation," Rottinghaus said. "The movie itself doesn't have much point. It's the audience participation stuff that makes it fun."

Donovan said the movie is not really for a conservative audience, but for people who are open-minded and who don't mind cutting loose in public.

"It's a tradition. People have seen it upwards of a hundred times," Donovan said.

Rottinghaus said the festival is a unique experience, and people who go to see it need to keep an open mind.

"It's fun if you get into it," he said.

The movie is just a movie if seen by itself, Donovan said. But he said it is truly an experience when seen with an audience.

"It's sort of a lifestyle for some people," he said. "It gives them the chance to express themselves in ways they can't in everyday life."

Halloween concert to raise money for leukemia patient

BY SHAWN VICK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former K-State student Christine Base's life changed dramatically Aug. 4.

This was the day that she was first diagnosed with acute lymphocytic leukemia.

Acute lymphocytic leukemia is a neoplastic disease of the blood-forming organs, resulting in an abnormal increase in the production of white blood cells. When this happens, the white blood cells take over the bone marrow found in blood, causing illness.

"I have never seen anyone so sick in my entire life," said Rob Watson, Base's fiance and member of the band Southwind. "I was willing to do anything to help her get well again."

In an effort to raise money for Base's treatment, Watson and the other members of Southwind put together a leukemia benefit concert. The 21-and-older concert and costume party will begin at 6 p.m. Sunday, at Bobby T's Bar and Grill and will feature Southwind as well as local bands Bitter Sane, The Rock Stars and Opus 13 Band Competition winner, Sharkey's Little Groove Box.

Admission to the concert will be $5, and the price of admission includes live music and a chance to win one of many great door prizes donated by local merchants, Watson said. Door prizes also will be given to audience members with the best costumes.

Base's family, along with Watson, sponsored a bone marrow drive Oct. 9 in Hutchison, Kan., in order to find a possible match for Base if the need for a transplant arose. Although the family received financial support from local sponsors and supporters, they weren't able to raise enough money to pay the $60 fee to test each individual. Watson said the family expected about 100 people to come for testing, but ended up testing almost 200 people.

"We were excited that so many people showed up to be tested, but we were unable to find a match for Christine, and her parents had to cover the extra costs for the testing," Watson said.

"To make up for her parent's loss of money, I decided to put on a leukemia benefit concert."

Jeremy Hollembeak, junior in chemistry and lead singer of Sharkey's Little Groove Box, said he and the members of his band jumped at the chance to help Watson with his goal.

"The band and I thought it was a really good cause so we said we would be more than happy to play in the concert," Hollembeak said.

Due to extensive chemotherapy treatments, the cancer now is in remission and will be able to attend the concert.

"I am really excited to go to the concert," Base said. "Because of my illness, I haven't been able to watch Rob play in the band yet."

Although the cancer is in remission, she will need treatments for several years and might need a bone-marrow transplant in the future. Because of this, an information table will be set up at the concert to allow people to sign up for a bone-marrow drive to take place at a later date.

"People take life for granted," Base said. "I miss the little things in life such as going to work in the morning, or having enough feeling in my fingers to button my own shirt."

Chilean drama provides glimpse of life during regime of Pinochet

BY KRISTEN DYMACEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State will have a taste of Chilean culture when the drama "Death and the Maiden" is performed at 8 tonight and Saturday in the Purple Masque Theatre.

Joel Bicknell, director of the play and graduate student in theater, said "Death and the Maiden," written by Ariel Dorfman, is set in present-day Chile.

Fifteen years before the play takes place, a woman named Paulina is abducted from the streets of Chile. She is held against her will and is emotionally and physically raped by a group of government rebels under the control of Gen. Augusto Pinochet.

On the night the play takes place, Paulina is at home with her husband, who is part of the new government investigating the atrocities of Pinochet.

When a man named Roberto appears on their doorstep, Paulina believes he might have been one of the men who had her captive years before.

"That's one of the big mysteries," Bicknell said. "It's also about how Paulina deals with the realization, the emotional and mental threats, from her memories."

Dramaturge Ilona Cookman, senior in theater, was responsible for the research for the production. Cookman said a lot of research about the history and culture of Chile had to be done for the play to be as accurate as possible.

"It's very much a different society than ours," Cookman said. "I researched history, art and even architectural styles."

Bicknell said the play contains mature language and situations not suitable for children.

"It's a very intense, intense play," he said, "but we have worked in comic moments."

"I think theater itself is an entertainment value people, especially students, don't take adavantage of."

— Elizabeth Otto, senior in theater

The cast and crew have had unique challenges working in the production, Bicknell said.

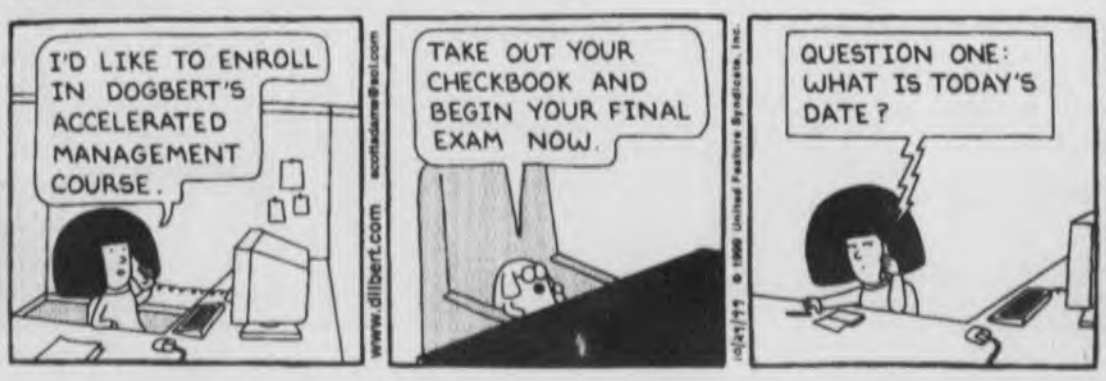
"Everyone working on the production are students at K-State. It's been a challenge for them because they're out of the realm of their experience. They've had to pay a lot of attention to detail. The audience will really see lots of detail," he said.

The Purple Masque is a different experience then what most people are used to, Bicknell said.

"It's really intimate and small," said Elizabeth Otto, a senior in theater who plays the part of Paulina. "Even though it is such a small space, you can do so much."

Bicknell said the size and atmosphere of the theater itself will make people feel right at home.

"It's going to feel as if you're right inside their house," Bicknell said. "Purple Masque has a relaxed atmosphere. It doesn't have the stigma of a formal event."



Otto said the entire theater experience is something not to be missed.

"I think theater itself is an entertainment value people, especially students, don't take advantage of," Otto said.

apparel design, said Goodnow Hall will be opening its doors to area children for trick-or-treating. She said many Hall Governing Board members have been contacting area churches and radio stations to advertise the activity.

"Many of the residents want to and are excited about handing out candy to the kids," Decker said. "It's not often we have the opportunity to get so many residents to contribute their time."

Dowell said Moore also will be allowing children from Manhattan grade schools to trick-or-treat through the hall along with the other residence halls. He said many of the residents have requested the activity and enjoy doing it every year.

"It has always been a good turnout, maybe 100 to 200 kids," Dowell said. "Everyone requests it every year because they want the kids to come. I think it makes them feel more involved with the community."

Melody Metsker, Putnam Hall president and senior in elementary and special education, said Putnam also will be opening its doors to trick-or treaters, but she said they have decided to postpone most of the holiday activities until after Homecoming.

"Homecoming takes so much time," Metsker said. "We really didn't see the reason why we should spend so much time on something else when there are a lot of things to do to prepare for Homecoming."

Metsker said residents of Strong Complex went to Kansas City, Mo., last weekend to go haunted housing.

She also said individual floors are decorating, and scary movies have been shown in the basement throughout the month.

"A lot of people get excited about decorating and buying the candy," Metsker said. "They remember when they were little and dressed up, so it is a good time to relive their childhoods."

Metsker said Putnam will be sponsoring November Fest on Nov. 5 for all of the Strong Complex residents. She said it will include a costume party for residents to come dressed in attire from different decades.

"We decided to push back our Halloween festivities and make it a celebration of the holiday and the end of the millennium," Metsker said. "Everyone who knows about it is really excited, but we are really pushing Homecoming right now, so many do not know about it yet."

Decker said Homecoming preparation also has hindered any significant Halloween activities for Goodnow, but she said the fifth floor is sponsoring a Halloween party tonight from 9 p.m. to midnight. She said there will be a costume contest and dance associated with the party, and it is catered to those residents who might not want to drink as at other parties.

"Many people will be partying and drinking this weekend because of the football game and Homecoming," Decker said. "Fifth floor traditionally uses part of their floor money to sponsor an event like this, so those who don't want to drink can still have fun."

performed to The Commodores' "Brick House" during its skit.

After the skits, the two teams took turns scrimmaging.

Senior forwards Nicky Ramage and Angie Finkes led the women's team. Ramage scored 8 points in the game as she repeatedly overpowered defenders.

Head coach Deb Patterson said the night was a nice chance for the team to meet the fans.

"It's always great for our players to get in here and scrimmage in front of people," Patterson said.

The men's basketball team took the floor next with a slam-dunk contest, highlighted by the play of freshman guard Kenyatta Dix.

Senior Josh Reid, one of the team's captains, scored 8 points in the scrimmage that followed.

After the game, Asbury said there was little the team could take away from the scrimmage because it was more for the fans.

He also said he was pleased with the players' quickness.

"I think you saw kind of the athleticism we have in this group," Asbury said. "All the way across the line, we have pretty good quickness on this team."

CARD

"There's quite a few people who have heard about the card," Ritchey said. "We want to work out some advertising."

Brad Meyer, owner of Breadeaux Pizza, said there are not enough businesses involved in Manhattan.

"It seems like there's not enough businesses using the card," Meyer said. "A lot of people are waiting to see whether it's a good thing."

Lowman's Men's Store, which honors the card, is debating the possibility of its discontinuation. Bill Lowman, owner of the store, said they are re-evaluating the use of the card.

"I think the card is a good idea, but we haven't seen a big benefit," Lowman said. "We aren't really getting any response."

To continue with the program, Lowman said he wants to make sure the card is being distributed to consumers.

Karen Medlin, owner of Westloop Floral, said people have been using the card and that it is a good way to attract new customers.

"We probably could do some more to promote the card," Medlin said. "People are a little more reluctant here because they don't know about it."

Brochures and applications are available in every store that honors the Capitol Card, Medlin said.

This program, which Ritchey said he hopes to expand across Kansas, also has participating merchants in Lawrence and Topeka. Ritchey said it benefits business owners by getting customers in their stores.

Steve Ballard, owner of Ballard Sporting Goods, said the Capitol Card does not work for his type of business.

"Our margins are such that the percentage to the Capitol Card didn't look good," Ballard said. "If it was a really successful program and everyone that purchased stuff from us used it, we'd lose money."

Legislators want primary to remain despite cost

By JOHN HANNA
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state's budget problems have caused talk of canceling the state's April 4 presidential primary, but legislative leaders want the election to go on as scheduled.

The state Democratic and Republican parties want the Legislature to set aside $1.6 million for the primary. If legislators don't and the election goes as scheduled, counties would pay the costs.

Some state officials said the money could be spent better to patch a tight budget, especially because Kansas' primary is relatively late.

However, legislative leaders in both parties do not want to cancel the primary. If it did, both parties would have a series of county, regional and state caucuses to select delegates to the national conventions.

"The $1.6 million is a small price to pay for people having an opportunity to express their opinions about who's going to be sitting in the highest office in the land," Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, said Thursday.

The state finished its 1999 fiscal year on June 30 with $73.4 million less than expected. Gov. Bill Graves already has proposed more than $43 million in cuts to the current budget, and his administration expects to consider deeper recessions for the state's 2001 budget year, which begins July 1, 2000.

Graves spokesman Mike Matson told The Wichita Eagle that the governor hasn't made up his mind on whether the state should spend money on a primary.

Matson said because of the budget problems and the late date of the primary, state financing of the primary is probably going to face a tough row to hoe.

Sen. Janice Hardenburger, chairwoman of the Senate Elections and Local Government Committee, said the money could be better spent on other programs, such as social services. She said having the primary would be wasteful.

Hardenburger, R-Haddam, has long been skeptical of the primary's benefits, as has House Speaker Robin Jennison, R-Healy.

However, Jennison said that if the state cancels its primary next year, it is lessening its chances of influencing the presidential nominating process.

Big 12 Conference passing leaders rankings based on total efficiency

The stretch run for the No. 5 K-State Wildcats starts Saturday at KSU Stadium when they battle the Baylor Bears — a team that's been more in tune with the "Bad News Bears."

For the Cats (7-0, 4-0), the game comes just after their second 21-point come-from-behind victory this season. As for the Bears (1-6, 0-4), their tough-luck mentality continues.

In week one, the Bears lost in overtime 30-29 to Boston College on a missed extra point. Unfortunately for the Bears, it didn't end there. Week two saw them drop another close affair on a fumble recovery that was returned 100 yards to win the game with no time left.

A week ago, the trend was the same when the Bears lost to Texas Tech 35-7 in a game that was 14-7 at one point. The turning point was a punt return returned for a touchdown that broke the 7-point ball game.

"You look at their schedule, and they should be 3-3 right now and ended up being 1-5," junior defensive end Monty Beisel said. "That puts a little different spin on things, but they've had a tough year thus far, and they're looking big going into this game."

Head coach Bill Snyder said he understands the problems Baylor has had.

"I'm sure it has been difficult for them," Snyder said. "I know it's been difficult for Coach Kevin Steele and his staff and for the players. They've just been through some hard times, and I can appreciate some of the things they go through.

"I think you can see that there are some good things happening. I thought that the Texas Tech ball game was very indicative of the direction that they're going."

As for K-State, it looks to improve upon its undefeated mark, working ever closer to a complete team performance. Last week at Oklahoma State, despite trailing early, K-State turned in what was deemed by most to be its most complete outing thus far, but once again, only for three quarters. More is to be desired before the Cats meet up with conference foes such as Colorado and Nebraska.

One high note last week was quarterback Jonathan Beasley. His 311-yard passing performance, combined with four passing touchdowns and two rushing touchdowns, proved to be his best

Big 12 Lineup

Texas (6-2, 3-1) at Iowa State (4-3, 1-3), 11:30 a.m.

No. 12 Texas will be looking to gather momentum from last weekend's 24-20 victory over Nebraska. The upset of the No. 8 Cornhuskers included 193 offensive yards from sophomore quarterback Major Applewhite. Despite Iowa State's losing record, including a 16-12 loss to Colorado over the weekend, the Longhorns will have to contain running back Darren Davis. Davis, one of the nation's top players at his position, has posted 100 yards or more in eight consecutive games.

Texas Tech (4-3, 3-1) at Missouri (3-4, 0-4), 1 p.m.

Despite the Tigers' lack of a conference victory, Saturday's matchup with Texas Tech is not an automatic Red Raider victory. Texas Tech upset Texas A&M earlier in the season and handed Colorado its first conference loss of the season Saturday, but the Red Raiders also fell to North Texas. Missouri will have to be at its prime, similar in form to the near upset of Colorado in 39-46 overtime loss, to knock off Tech.

Oklahoma (4-2, 2-1) at Colorado (4-3, 3-1), 1:30 p.m.

This is a matchup full of momentum. Oklahoma carries a 51-6 victory over Texas A&M to Colorado, where the Buffaloes return home after downing Texas Tech, 16-12. With nearly identical records, both overall and conference, Oklahoma looks to score early, having scored a first possession touchdown in three straight games, while Colorado may start a different offensive lineup for the 21st straight game.

Oklahoma State (3-3, 1-2) at Texas A&M (5-2, 2-2), 2:30 p.m.

This is a game of rebounds. Both teams enter Saturday's matchup coming off of decisive losses last weekend. Oklahoma State gave up a 21-0 lead in the first half, falling to K-State 44-21, while the Aggies fell victim to the Oklahoma Sooners 51-6. With the status of A&M's quarterback Randy McCown unclear, the Cowboys' Tony Lindsay will be looking to add to his 21 rushing touchdowns and 17 passing touchdowns.

Nebraska (6-1, 3-1) at Kansas (3-5, 1-3), 6 p.m.

Again, it's a game of bounce back, as the No. 8 Nebraska Cornhuskers head to Lawrence hoping to avenge their 20-24 loss to Texas this past weekend. The Jayhawks, with a shut out victory over Missouri less than a week ago, will be looking for the upset behind junior quarterback Dylen Smith, who threw a career-long 62-yard pass in the victory over Missouri.

COMEBACK KIDS

Wildcats look to go beyond previous 2nd-half performances, improve overall game in Saturday's matchup against Baylor

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 5 K-State Wildcats have proved this season that tardiness isn't all that bad.

K-State has overcome sluggish first-half performances to erase three first-half deficits this season, gaining the unwanted distinction of a second-half team.

Head coach Bill Snyder said it's good that K-State has been able to come back, but his team's goal is to play effectively the entire game, not just sporadically.

"We've been a very good second-half team," he said. "I don't know the numbers off hand, but they are quite astonishing. We need to fully scrutinize our pre-preparation time, but I don't think motivation is a factor."

In the first halves of its seven contests, Snyder's squad has put up an average of only 174.4 yards of total offense and 18 points, while the defense is allowing 162.7 yards and 11.3 points. These numbers aren't awful, but they include lopsided games against non-conference opponents Temple and Utah State.

Against Big 12 competition, though, the Wildcats have allowed nearly 200 yards and produced just 16.75 points in the first half.

K-State's 44-21 victory over Oklahoma State is indicative of the Wildcats' first-half performance.

Cowboys quarterback Tony Lindsay racked up 217 yards and three quick scores in the first half. But the Cats, who recovered from a 28-7 first-half deficit against Iowa State, allowed only 60 yards of total offense in the second half and scored 44 unanswered points.

"We looked like a kindergarten team out there for a while," Snyder said. "Our biggest concerns were getting lined up with their formations."

With the Cowboys having a week to prepare for the Wildcats, K-State defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said the Cat defense had to adjust in the first quarter to Oklahoma State's complicated offensive schemes.

"They had us on our heels," he said. "But our kids didn't lose faith in making adjustments. I knew that if we made adjustments, we could take the game under control and we did."

When K-State is able to make adjustments after the break, Bennett's defense has been stunning.

K-State is the only team in the top 10 of the BCS standings not to allow a second-half touchdown this season. Texas place kicker Kris Stockton's field goal in the second half of K-State's 35-17 victory over the Longhorns constituted the only points a team has scored on the Wildcats after halftime.

K-State has held its opposition to an average of just 88.4 yards of total offense and .4 points per game in the second half, while the offense has been just as productive, putting an average of 245.9 yards of total offense and 22.6 points on the board.

"I think it comes from a lot of things," Snyder said of his team's second-half success. "Whether that requires adjustments or an understanding of what has taken place, than those are things that have to be communicated toward our young people."

Despite the Cats playing well late in the ball games, junior defensive end Monty Beisel said the Wildcats aren't proud of lackluster early performances.

"Obviously, we want to come out and punch people in the mouth right away," he said.

Junior strong safety Jarrod Cooper said Bennett's ability to make adjustments has helped the Cats improve on first-half inefficiencies.

"We're getting better," Cooper said. "At Iowa State it took him a half. At Texas it took him a quarter and a half and against Oklahoma State just a quarter. So he's gotten a lot faster."

Due to the offensive struggles, Beisel said earlier in the season the defense wasn't able to make adjustments between series, relying on halftime to make changes.

"We are trying to get three and out on every series to get the offense on the field to create some plays," he said. "Earlier in the season the offense was having a little bit of trouble and left our defense on the field a lot. We didn't have a chance to make corrections."

Despite K-State's second-half performance, linebacker Ben Leber said "Win one for the Gipper" speeches aren't in Snyder's coaching regimen at halftime.

"He just tells us basically things that we already know," Leber said. "Its not so much a rah-rah, go get 'em speech. It's just, 'You guys know what you need to do. Go out and do it.'"

Critics don't see true character of Cat football players

VIEWPOINT

JON BALMER

Go ahead, despise the K-State Wildcats.

Join all of the pundits and media personnel on either coasts and throw all of your anger at a successful team nestled in the heartland.

That seems to be what's comic these days.

It's interesting that, in a time of corrupt boxers, dead-beat dads who double as ball players and athletes a little too friendly with the nose candy, head coach Bill Snyder's bunch seems to draw a large amount of ire in the sporting world.

Some believe the Cats haven't earned their stripes due to a weak non-conference schedule. Others argue that the players are too cocky. Nothing new here, but many K-State fans thought the bashing would ease up with the team's continued success in 1999.

As ESPN "Gameday" analyst Lee Corso would say, "Not so fast, my friend."

The biggest reason for the scorn is that the media dislike a Cinderella that overstays its welcome. Sure, when a losing program puts together a big season that results in a bowl berth, that's a great story. But don't expect an invitation to stay.

You see, old-school writers are territorial about their dominant programs. Beano Cook, God bless him, will go to his grave believing USC always will be better than the Cats. They just don't make room for newcomers on the national-title front.

There's no reason to have such disdain for K-State, though. Sure, there might be some cockiness to the team, but when was the last time you witnessed linebackers giving each other golf-claps after a big sack? It just doesn't happen anymore.

The 1999 version of K-State football is loaded with reasons not to despise these Powercats of the plains, most of which revolves around the personnel.

Take Jarrod Cooper, for example.

The junior strong safety might be the fiercest player on the field during a game, but his character off it is the stuff Yogi Berra would be proud of.

When defensive end Darren Howard tied for the school sacks record, Cooper promised to break dance when he got the record. On the field, mind you.

I haven't heard that kind of statement since the '80s film "Electric Boogaloo Breakin' 2."

Unfortunately, Coop's dance routine never became a reality since Howard broke the mark when the game was still tight. Don't think Coop won't find something else to celebrate later in the season, though.

What may come as outrageous statements for some was just another quip for the Wildcats' most outspoken player. Remember, this is the man who wears blond dreadlocks and raised piranhas last year.

If you're looking for tales of perseverance, look no further than Frank Murphy. "Much-maligned" is an understatement when you consider his track record: Enters K-State on a four-game suspension, breaks his foot before the start of the 1999 season, returns for a big start in the first four games this season, then suffers an injury on his other leg.

Despite the hardships, Murphy doesn't complain. He just continues to rehab and should be back soon. It would have been easier for the old Frank Murphy to call it quits after so many difficulties. Don't expect the same from a man focused on forgetting his troubled past by proving himself every day and enjoying the opportunities before him.

Consider Damion McIntosh, the Cats' versatile lineman. A strong presence on the field, the soft-spoken McIntosh never has a disparaging word to say off of it.

Skeptics are quick to knock K-State for many things other top-25 programs also possess, and sometimes often out of Snyder's control. (Yes, there are some things Snyder can't control.) But taking the easy route doesn't give the team a fair rap. Take the time to look a little deeper, and the groups that have cried out against the Cats for so long might actually discover something admirable about Bill's "bullies."

If not, I'm sure Beano will have a seat ready and waiting for you.

Cats' defensive secondary evolves from questionable to powerful

K-State's Dyshod Carter reaches up for a pass deflected by Jarrod Cooper (background) that was intended for ISU's Andy Steensrud in the third quarter of last year's game in Manhattan.

BY RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A unit considered one of the biggest question marks for the Wildcats following last season's stretch-run collapse has blossomed into one of the team's strengths this year.

CHAPMAN

The defensive secondary has rallied impressively from late-season efforts last year, in which it allowed 554 yards and six touchdowns in consecutive losses to Texas A&M and Purdue.

This season, the unit leads the nation in pass efficiency defense and already has snared 14 interceptions, only two short of its total from all of last season.

What accounts for such a dramatic change in a unit composed of the same players as the one that struggled at times last season?

According to free safety Lamar Chapman, who is tied for the team lead with three interceptions, it is the return of veteran defensive backs Jarrod Cooper, Jerametrius Butler and Dyshod Carter that has keyed the secondary's success this year.

"We've played together for two or three years now, me, Coop, Dyshod and Jerametrius," Chapman said. "We've just started to get a feel for each other, and I think that's what makes a good secondary."

Much of the credit for developing those players into a cohesive unit could be attributed to defensive coordinator and defensive backs coach Phil Bennett.

Strong safety Cooper said Bennett has emphasized tailoring defensive strategies to the strengths of his players, a change Cooper said was welcome.

"He talks to us more, asks us our opinion," Cooper said. "It's, 'Do you think you can do this?' It's not like, 'You got to do this and this.' He wants to know how you think about things and do you feel good about it. He's a little more player-friendly."

TYLER

Since becoming coordinator in the offseason, one of Bennett's stated objectives has been to find ways to lend more help to the Wildcat cornerbacks than they were given in the aggressive man-to-man coverages employed by predecessor Mike Stoops.

One of the ways he has gone about this is to employ more zone-coverage principles, a change that Chapman said gives opposing offenses more to digest than Stoops' virtually all-man-to-man schemes did.

"This year we play a lot more zone to keep teams thinking about different things," Chapman said. "Last season we would just line up, and they knew we had man and a safety deep."

Cornerback DeRon Tyler said the new, more diversified approach to coverage has left more tools at the disposal of K-State's cornerbacks in choosing how to neutralize their man.

"When you know you have help, you can do certain things you can't do if you don't have help," Tyler said.

"You can jam a little more, you can put hands on receivers a little more, you can play with the quarterback a little more, look at the quarterback, because you know you have someone helping you."

Another way Bennett has gone about improving the pass defense has been to employ the All-Big 12 safety tandem of Cooper and Chapman in a greater variety of roles than they had been used previously.

Whereas last season Chapman was responsible almost exclusively for covering the deep middle portion of the field, this season he has spent considerable time in coverage, responsible for neutralizing the other team's slot receiver. Meanwhile, Cooper, who is primarily known for his run-stopping, has taken a greater share of pass-defending chores than he had previously.

Though the new roles have taken some getting used to, Chapman said he enjoys having a broader role in the defense.

"I like this defense a lot better because it's more fun and exciting and it gives me a lot more to do instead of me just always going back in the deep middle," he said. "I give help to the corners more, but I also cover a lot more."

With the way the secondary has jelled this season, Chapman said this might be one of the best secondaries in K-State history, a fact that statistics would seem to support. Head coach Bill Snyder, however, isn't so quick to place the '99 Wildcat pass defense at the head of the class.

"We've had good defenses here," he said. "I couldn't tell you that this is the best defense that we've put on the field in our time here. Not yet, I certainly wouldn't be able to say that."

However, cornerback Carter, whose three interceptions tie him with Chapman for the team lead, said the best is yet to come for the K-State secondary.

"I think that we've haven't played to our best yet," Carter said. "We have a lot more that we could do."

of the season so far. Now, trying to make it two in a row is the goal at hand.

"I was more patient in the pocket," Beasley said. "The offensive line did a good job blocking for me and Aaron (Lockett). Quincy (Morgan) and George (Williams) all got open where I could throw the ball for them to catch it."

The passing game was just one aspect of an offensive showing that produced 520 total yards, all of which were on the nation's then-No. 4 defense.

"It was a pretty good performance," offensive lineman Ian Moses said. "We came out with a pretty slow start, which we can't have. We have to get that corrected. We did some good things and some things that still need corrected because when we face better teams, it might come back and get us."

Snyder said improvement as a whole is still what he wants his team to focus on, despite preparing to play the worst team in the Big 12.

"We have to improve because of what our whole program is all about," Snyder said.

"We're trying to make improvement, not because it's Baylor or anyone else that we're playing. It's important for us to improve because that's the way we're going to get to where all these young guys would eventually want to be.

"I can't tell our football team that Baylor University is the best football team that they will play throughout the course of this year. What I can tell them is that if you don't prepare well and if you don't play well and play hard, then Baylor is a football team that is capable of preparing well and very capable of playing very hard and very capable of playing with great emotion and therefore very capable of defeating us."

The Bears' offense features running back Darrell Bush, who so far has rushed for 489 yards while averaging 4.2 yards per jaunt.

Quarterbacking the Bears is Jermaine Alfred. Alfred has posted pretty solid numbers this season but struggled with interceptions, throwing six compared to his four touchdown passes.

Remarkably, considering Baylor has been on the losing side of things, Alfred has been forced to throw late into the ball games and still has been able to post a completion percentage of 57 percent, 12 percent higher than that of Beasley.

Defending against Alfred's passes is the nation's No. 4 defense, anchored by the top pass defense.

With the comparisons in mind, Beisel said Baylor has some talented athletes on a team that can jump up and bite opponents if they aren't prepared.

"They have some players," Beisel said. "They have some running backs and quarterbacks that can run the ball. Like coach said, they're probably not the best opponent we could prepare for right now, but they're definitely not the worst.

"They possess the possibility that they can come out and do some things to hurt us. That's obvious with the A&M game. They got away lucky in the first half with the lead. We know they can do some things."

STINGY PASS DEFENSE

K-State leads the nation in pass-efficiency defense with 68.1 rating points. The Wildcats also have recorded an interception in a school-record 15 consecutive games dating back to last season. Homecoming parade to start downtown, add goats to lineup

By LESLIE ELSASSER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 2,000 people will participate in Saturday's Homecoming parade, but the most unusual participants won't join the parade until Fremont Street.

Three goats will start walking when the parade travels on Fremont as a part of Barnyard Bingo, a fund raiser to help the Retired Seniors Volunteer Program Leadership in Literacy effort.

For $3, a 2- by 2-foot square will be marked on Fremont, and if a goat goes to the bathroom on a square, a cash prize will be awarded to the person who donated the money for the particular square. The proceeds support Leadership in Literacy, a volunteer program for senior citizens to read to children at Bluemont and Woodrow Wilson elementary schools. Lori Bishop, RSVP executive director, said children's books will be purchased with the money from Barnyard Bingo.

"We're hoping to build a take-home library so kids can have their own library to encourage reading," she said. "We want it to be a book-enriched environment. I don't think enough kids read at home, and hopefully this will encourage kids to read, and their parents will encourage them to read."

The parade begins at 4:30 p.m. at the west Dillard's entrance at Manhattan Town Center, travels on Poyntz Avenue to 11th Street, Fremont Street to North Manhattan Avenue and concludes at 11th and Moro streets. Bernie Haney, assistant director of in-state programs for the KSU Alumni Association and chairman of the All-University Homecoming Committee, said the parade is a good way to create enthusiasm for the Homecoming game.

"We'd like the local community to join the excitement and join the spirit of Homecoming at K-State," he said. "It's a long-time tradition."

Alumni involvement in Homecoming is important, and Haney said everyone is welcome at the pep rally after the parade even if they can't attend the parade.

"We'd like more alumni to come back for the parade, and for them to get here by 4:30 on a Friday afternoon is probably really difficult for a lot of people," Haney said. "That's a big thing to get the alumni involved, and if they can't make the parade, we highly recommend that everybody come out for the pep rally. It's a chance to get excited about the game against Baylor, and it's a chance for K-Staters to get together and have a good time."

The pep rally will start at 6 p.m. at Memorial Stadium. Participants include the K-State Marching Band, Classy Cats and Willie the Wildcat. The floats also will be on display at Memorial Stadium during the pep rally.

There is a $1,000 spending limit on the floats, but Haney said talented people can make $1,000 look like $10,000.

"There is so much creativity going on throughout the week with the spirit banner, with the floats, with Pant the Chant competition," he said. "That just makes it even more exciting for people to come out and see the different things because the students really put their minds together and come up with some different ideas. They just don't want a generic idea because everybody else is coming up with some pretty neat things."

Being spirited is an important part of the competition, Haney said.

"We know all the Homecoming student-competition people are going to participate, and that's an exciting time for them as well," he said. "They have a good time at the parade because part of our student competition is the spirit component of the parade. There's going to be a lot of enthusiasm and spirit because that's part of the point procedure. That makes it fun and exciting for them, and it makes it fun for the community because people aren't just walking through it."

Soher Makary (center) and other friends and family of passengers on an EgyptAir jetliner that crashed into the ocean off Nantucket Island early Sunday await further news. Makary's brother was aboard the aircraft.

217 believed dead following jetliner crash

■ Clinton says search has uncovered no indication of foul play; Americans represented majority of passengers.

BY DAVID CRARY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — An EgyptAir jetliner bound for Cairo with 217 people on board plunged 33,000 feet in two minutes, crashing into the ocean off Nantucket Island early Sunday. Dozens of American tourists were among the passengers.

By nightfall, searchers had retrieved debris and one body but held out little hope of finding survivors in the chilly Atlantic waters.

Authorities said the pilots made no distress call before the Boeing 767 plummeted to the sea in two minutes from 33,000 feet. Though the FBI and other intelligence agencies began checking on the possibility of sabotage, President Clinton and other officials said there was no immediate indication of foul play.

"We do not know at this point what caused the crash," said Jim Hall, chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board. "We are beginning what may be a long investigation."

Searchers found two partially inflated life rafts, life jackets, passports, seat cushions and other small debris, none with any burn marks, said Coast Guard Rear Adm. Richard M. Larrabee. A finding of such marks on debris could suggest the possibility of a fire or explosion aboard the plane.

Clinton, about to depart for Europe for Middle East peace talks, said there was no evidence of foul play at this time.

"I think it's better if people draw no conclusions until we know something," said Clinton, who called Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak to offer condolences and U.S. assistance.

The air search was suspended after dark, but ships continued scouring the area. The Coast Guard said chances of anyone surviving more than 12 hours in the 58-degree water were slim.

A Navy salvage ship, the USS Grapple, and Navy divers were leaving Norfolk, Va., on Sunday night and were expected to join the search by late Monday, with orders to take debris and remains to a Navy base in Rhode Island.

U.S. officials indicated a majority of the 199 passengers on Flight 990 were Americans, including a group of 54 people bound for a 14-day trip to Egypt and the Nile.

K-State football player arrested

■ Police arrest Cats' defensive tackle over weekend for suspicion of battery.

BY JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State football starting defensive tackle Cliff Holloman was arrested Sunday for suspicion of battery, police said.

HOLLOMAN

Sgt. Tim Hegarty of the Riley County Police Department said that at 12:18 a.m., a citizen told an officer about a crime occurring at 612 N. 12th St.

At 12:50 a.m., Holloman was arrested on suspicion of battery charges, Hegarty said.

"We call it suspicion of battery, because the official charging has not been held yet," Hegarty said. "Our officer had probable cause that the battery had occurred."

Kent Brown, K-State Sports Information director, said the situation would be handled according to normal practice.

"It will be handled internally between the coach and the player," he said.

Holloman, a senior who was recruited as one of the top defensive players in the country last year coming out of community college, has 22 tackles this season.

MUNCIE, Ind. — A group of men who were turned away from a college Halloween party early Sunday opened fire on the small house, killing one man and wounding five others.

About 100 people had packed into the home after a Ball State University fraternity party. About 4 a.m., a car pulled into an alley behind the house and began firing into the home, said Marlon Glass, 31, who was at the party.

The house, in a student neighborhood near campus, was riddled with bullet holes, and a trail of shell casings still led from the back door to the alley Sunday afternoon.

The windows of some of the half-dozen cars parked behind the house had been shot out. Police and witnesses said at least two people had fired as many as 40 rounds from outside, and investigators were looking in to whether shots were fired inside the house as well.

Julian Brown, 28, a former Ball State student from Gary, Ind., was found dead in the kitchen, Muncie police Chief Joe Winkle said.

Two people were in fair condition Sunday at Ball Memorial Hospital and two were treated and released, a hospital spokesman said. One person was treated at the scene.

"It was a private gathering. It wasn't a wild party or anything like that. It just got out of hand," said David Keels, an adviser for Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity. A Kappa Alpha Psi member who lived in the house had invited several people over after the fraternity party at the local YMCA, Keels said.

The shooters' identities still hadn't been determined Sunday afternoon, Winkle said.

Weather both boon, bane to farmers throughout state

Another harvest has concluded in Kansas. While the yields around the state have been drastically different, good weather has allowed most farmers to have a quick, delay-free harvest.

"The actual harvest this year went very well," said Dale Fjell, K-State Division of Cooperative Extension crop specialist. "The dry weather really helped."

Carole Jordan, public information officer for the Kansas Department of Agriculture, said this year's harvest was a little below average on the whole but the quality of crops was better.

"The sunflower harvest is up 52 percent over last year, but everything else is at least 4- or 5-percent lower than last year," Jordan said.

Fjell said farmers in the eastern part of the state were hurt by this year's dry summer. Soybeans were hit especially hard in the region. However, in western Kansas, farmers fared well as corn yields were high.

"This is more of the normal pattern we see here in Kansas," Fjell said. "The last two years everyone has gotten rain. This year there was a lot of variability, which is more what we expect."

The weather has varied around Kansas, but one thing has stayed constant for all Kansas farmers: low crop prices.

Doug French farms in the Kansas River valley and got an average yield from his farm this year. French said this year's soybean prices were the lowest he'd ever seen.

"Farmers need to become students on how to become more efficient. All they can do is lower input costs and get the highest yields they can."

— DALE FJELL, K-STATE DIVISION OF COOPERATIVE EXTENSION CROP SPECIALIST

"I don't see the price of crops going much lower than what they are now," French said. "However, I don't see them going any higher, either."

Supply and demand dictate the costs of goods, and this is a lesson Kansas farmers know too well.

"It's a combination of too much supply and not enough demand," Jordan said. "We've had bumper crops over the last few years in the U.S. Also, the last few years there's been an economic crisis in Asia, usually one of our biggest importers. So we just don't have the markets we need."

Farmers around Kansas and the rest of the United States are feeling the pinch from the poor market. The global economy has heightened competition, and French said the U.S. government is not helping the situation.

"The government needs to stop giving Third World countries money and start giving them grain," French said. "The U.S. needs to stop putting embargoes on countries so we can start selling them grain. We need to find a place to take our crops."

Fjell said farmers around the state feel the government should let them sell their grain to anyone who wants to buy it.

"There is a big concern about embargoes," Fjell said. "The only thing farmers can do is work through the legislature."

Fjell said there is not much an individual farmer can do to change crop prices. He said they need to instead focus on efficiency.

"Farmers need to become students on how to become more efficient," Fjell said. "All they can do is lower input costs and get the highest yields they can."

The future isn't clear for Kansas farmers; there is no easy way to raise crop prices. For now, farmers will reassess this year's harvest and work on getting higher yields next year.

Homecoming week concludes

BY JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

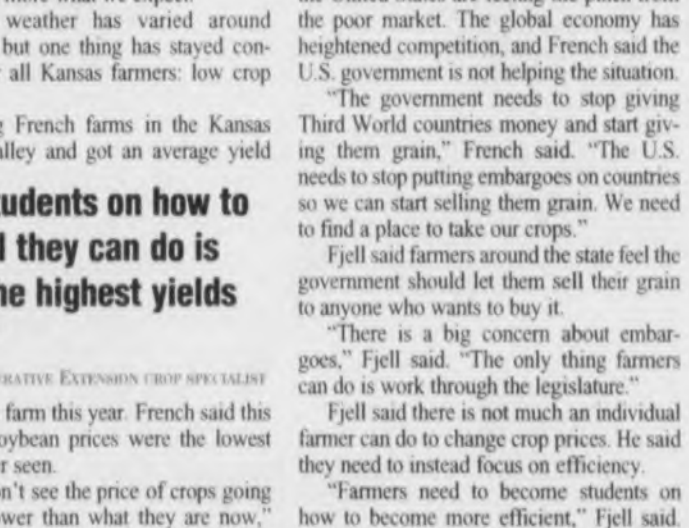
The hectic week of Homecoming is over, and it's time for everyone to start recovering.

The wake of the 1999 Homecoming competitions, float-making and football watching yielded new K-State Student Ambassadors, extra points for living groups and some incredible Wildcat spirit.

Bernie Haney, chairman for All-University Homecoming Committee, said Homecoming events went well.

"Everyone had fun with the events that they competed in," Haney said.

The week began with hanging spirit banners in the Union Courtyard on Monday. Haney said the organizations that won the spirit banner design competitions were Marlatt and West halls for the residence halls; the collaboration of Pi Beta Phi, Delta Upsilon and Sigma Chi for the greek organizations; and the Black Student Union for campus organizations.



Also on Monday, Marlatt and West won the Crazy Cat Kickoff, a residence hall event.

The punt, pass and kick contest on Tuesday was led by Eric Swan, freshman in sociology, for overall points.

Michael Johnson, junior in marketing and international business, won the punt competition, and Rod Jerrick, graduate student in agricultural economics, won the pass competition. Jameon Schwarz, sophomore in landscape architecture, won the kick competition.

Virgin auction, costumes highlight picture show

Mark Harrison (left), sophomore in mechanical engineering, talks with Melanie Bean, sophomore in advertising, before the costume contest preceding the showing of "The Rocky Horror Picture Show." In addition to the costume contest, a virgin auction began at midnight Saturday.

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The familiar screening of "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" has rung in the Halloween holiday for the past 10 years.

Union Program Council's Feature and Kaleidoscope films Committees have sponsored the 10th consecutive midnight viewing of the 1975 cult classic, complete with grab bags of props that allow audience members to participate in the movie.

This year's showing, at midnight Saturday, boasted several hundred people in attendance, most in costumes that ranged from the movie's characters to outfits such as Kung Fu Elvis and Miss Pot Roast 1969.

The event kicked off with the costume contest, during which all costumed audience members were judged by applause from the remainder of the audience.

After this was the virgin auction, an event in which all audience members who have not viewed "Rocky Horror" in a large audience setting were auctioned to the highest bidder, with items such as old Tootsie Roll wrappers and old underwear.

Frank Taplin, former K-State student and Abilene resident, said he has seen "Rocky Horror" at K-State nine times and has seen it 35 times overall. Taplin said he remembers his first experience and the humiliation of being labeled a virgin at the event.

"My first year, I saw 'Rocky' in Denver, and it was kind of embarrassing," Taplin said. "The hosts painted a big red 'V' on my forehead. For the first half of the show, I had to be a footstool for the person who bought me, and during the second half of the show, I had to carry around a big sign that said, 'I'm a virgin; please be gentle when you squeeze me.'"

Jennifer McDaneld, sophomore in elementary education, said it was her first time seeing "Rocky Horror" in a large audience setting, and the embarrassment was minimal.

"It wasn't quite as humiliating as I thought it would be," she said, "but my advice to other virgins would be to wear a costume. It really isn't as bad as they make it sound."

Melanie Bean, sophomore in mass communications, was co-host of the show with Mary Renee Smith, former K-State student and veteran host of "Rocky Horror." Bean, in her first year as host, said her maiden show went well.

"People seemed to enjoy themselves, and with Mary there, it was very fun," Bean said. "Things wouldn't have been as structured if Mary wasn't there."

Taplin also said attending the show in costume is an integral part of the "Rocky Horror" experience. Taplin previously has dressed as characters in the movie, and has acted out the character's scenes onstage.

"I've played Riff-Raff, Dr. Frank-N-Furter and Magenta," he said. "I usually spend about $30 on my costume each year. It's just no fun if you don't dress up. You've got to go in costume."

Kansas teens work to prevent smoking

BY SHARLA ROWLEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas teen-agers are working hard to reduce tobacco use among Kansas youth. They are joining tobacco-free clubs, talking to state policy-makers and communicating nationwide their ideas for reducing the teen smoking rate.

A recent study done by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment indicates the percentage of middle school kids who use tobacco in Kansas is almost as high as the adult rate. While the adult usage of cigarettes in Kansas has reached an all-time low of 22.7 percent, more than 20 percent of Kansas middle school students — students between the age of 11 and 13 — are using tobacco on a regular basis.

"The data clearly shows the need for successful prevention programs at the middle school level and earlier," said Clyde Graeber, Kansas Secretary of health and environment.

The program Teens As Teachers allows high school students to serve as peer mentors to middle school students.

Students selected by their high school counselors participate in a full-day workshop and talk about how tobacco products are advertised and how they are targeted toward youth, said Joan Smith, health educator for the Riley County/Manhattan Health Department.

"It's basically an activism training. It teaches kids how political processes work and why the tobacco companies are so powerful," Smith said. "Looking back 20 and 30 years ago, we had the beginning of activism and protesters. We're teaching the youth now how to do it appropriately and effectively so things get done."

After the workshop, the students are trained to go into middle and elementary schools and talk about not starting to use tobacco.

"It is important to have a group of teens who talk with the younger kids and teach them about the problems with tobacco, so it's not just the teachers," Smith said.

Harrison Rivers, a Manhattan High School senior, wrote a grant with the mission to establish a statewide communication network that would work to reduce tobacco use among Kansas youth.

"If the grant is passed in November, so many things will be done Smith said. There are ideas for a Web site, focus groups, video conferences, advertising and developing a universal symbol for smoke-free school grounds. I will be very surprised if Harrison doesn't get this grant."

Rivers, who was instrumental in going before the school board and getting smoke-free school grounds for Manhattan schools, USD 383, was selected by the Kansas Smokeless Teens Initiative, along with a student from Overland Park, last spring to attend a meeting in Florida on activism and youth participation with the anti-tobacco program.

"I was lucky enough to be his escort down there," Smith said. "The kids went to the beach and drafted a resolution about the efforts they wanted to make in the future. On the way home, these kids were so excited about this nationwide movement. It was awesome."

Rivers previously had served as president of Teens Against Smoking in Kansas, a committee consisting of about 25 Kansas students who are selected annually to organize the Smoke-free Teens Are Rising rally in Topeka.

About 500 students from across the state travel to Topeka to attend an education session.

Professionals in advertising or policy-makers are usually asked to be guest speakers, Smith said.

Following the education session, the students march to the Statehouse and have a rally on the steps. At this time, they are free to go visit with the legislator from their district.

"It's a powerful tool that is used," Smith said. "Kids have a tremendously powerful voice. Tobacco companies are targeting youth, and they are the ones who understand why the advertising works. They have a right to have their voices heard."

Rose interview harms journalists' reputations

What should have been an awe-inspiring night for baseball fans turned into a vicious harangue by NBC reporter Jim Gray. He tried to advance his career during last week's World Series with a poor line of questioning. In the process, he made interviewing a little more difficult for reporters everywhere.

Moments after Pete Rose, baseball's all-time leading hitter, received wild applause for being named to the all-century baseball team, Gray attacked. He beat Rose repeatedly with the same question.

Isn't it time you admit you bet on baseball? Gray asked again and again. Rose responded "No" as many times as Gray asked the question.

It was obvious Rose had no intention of answering any other way, but Gray would not let his line of questioning drop. Gray later told reporters he was just doing his job. He is right.

It is a reporter's job to ask tough questions that need answered. It is not a reporter's job to ruin what should have been a beautiful moment for one of baseball's greatest heroes. It was the wrong time and the wrong place for the attack.

Gray should have asked the question, but beating it to death was in poor taste. A wiser reporter would have eased into the gambling line of questioning. A wise reporter would have pushed the question more than once. But after it became clear what Rose's one and only response would be, a wise reporter would have given up, at least for the time being, and allowed the fans and Rose to bask in the moment. That apparently just wasn't an option for Gray, and the news became Gray's botched interview rather than the magic of the evening.

Thanks a lot, Jim. You gave reporters everywhere a bad name.

Have a Merry Corporate Christmas

People who celebrate should pull out all stops, but commercialization must have some limits

KEN WELLS

For everything, there is a season. Or a seasoning. Generally, it's garlic. Oops. Digressed. Sorry. Where was I?

Ah, yes. It was the weekend of Oct. 16. I was perusing the local global-conglomerate retail shop only to stumble upon an entire section dedicated to ... sigh. Christmas.

Let me put these cards on the table first: Christmas is not my favorite time of the year. There are a lot of reasons for this, a chief example being the commercialization and commodification of a season supposedly spiritual in nature. Then there's the year I got a potato for Christmas. Yes, a damn potato. A real, starchy, edible potato. No, it wasn't on my wish list.

Still, we can get over this. We can cope with the fact that some marketing genius is going to find a way to profit off whatever holiday or season gets spewed by the calendar or, if necessary, to invent days merely to be exploited commercially. Considering we're staring down the barrel of "Kansas State University, brought to you by Coca-Cola" or Pepsi Cola logos on our diplomas, it's hard to deny the modern corporate reality we're feeding. I'm waiting for the day when we get "Easter, brought to you by Miller Beer, official corporate sponsor of the annual celebration of the Resurrection."

But, for the love of God, there have to be limits.

I'm somewhat thankful that the recent tide of greeting cards for every occasion seems to have peaked. I can't find any sections under "Birthday: Surrogate Mother" or "So Glad to See You're Gay" or "Sorry to Hear About Your Partial-Birth Abortion." Some things deserve individual attention and shouldn't be pre-packaged. Either someone else has clued into this, or maybe they're still in development.

But OCTOBER? Christmas before Halloween? Are we really this desperate to start our holiday shopping? Are our lives so bereft of daily festivity that we're forced to live in perpetual preparation for Dec. 25?

We gotta have limits.

If you don't want to celebrate Halloween because you're convinced it's an evil, satanic holiday because of all the demons and goblins and Jar Jar Binkses cavorting about, fine. If you choose not to celebrate Thanksgiving because you're painfully aware of the irony of commemorating "cooperation" with indigenous populations hundreds of years before the Trail of Tears, hey, go on with your bad self. If you don't celebrate Easter because of that nasty incident with the feral rabbit and the rancid ham, I just don't care.

Yet, surely there's a reasonable window for seasonal celebration. We're not buying fireworks for July 4, 2000, yet. We're not hiding our Easter eggs yet. If you want to get ready for the once-in-a-lifetime graduation or New Year's Eve '99, hey, that I understand. But it's Christmas. The same once-every-year Christmas. There'll be another. Why dilute the effect of that holiday by preparing for it and being so aware of it for so much of the year? How special is it when you spend a fourth of the year decorating, singing or otherwise immersing yourself in it?

Want to dog me for being a Scrooge while you write a check for your 100-volt, illuminated-waving Santa and laser-strobe-nosed Rudolph? Fine. Bite me. If your idea of Christmas spirit is swimming around in MasterCard receipts and ATM slips, then I got'cher Scrooge right here, buddy. If that's what your tiny mind perceives as celebratory and spiritual, may you be stapled into your own neon-illuminated, music-playing, rotating nativity scene.

But if you remember why the day's even on the calendar to begin with, if you want to celebrate the spirit, embody the ideals and feel the essence of the holiday, and you don't have to shell out cash at the MacroMart for it, then, by all means, raise the roof. Celebrate responsibly, but once you do, pull out the stops. Ignore the pre-packaged holiday. Make your own. Dress up the cat. Wear Christmas lights to work. Bake cookies, sing songs, make a holiday meatloaf. But every time you reach for the billfold, ask yourself: "What would Jesus put on layaway?"

Oh, and make Christmas chili with extra garlic. Don't argue. Just trust me.

Why can't we all just get along?

Collegian sometimes neglects coverage of everyday student happenings

REBEKKA MARTIN

The Collegian does a great job of reporting what is happening at K-State. Unfortunately, the newspaper does not always do as well at reporting what students are doing.

One could argue that students and faculty are participating in campus events, so the Collegian is reporting what they are doing. But that's not quite true. Many people at K-State are an integral part of campus life, but rarely, if ever, participate in the campus events that make the paper.

That might be because there is so much more to college life than lectures and charity fund-raisers. Those things are important and speak well for K-State, but students also are doing projects, preparing for careers and having fun pursuing personal goals.

The Collegian recently reported research done by faculty and students to make boards out of wheat straw — one example of projects being done at K-State that will have an effect on people outside the university. Another story described a student in human resources and industrial and labor relations who was delaying her graduation to gain experience as an intern for NASA.

Collegian editors and reporters are writing features about K-Staters doing cool things. There certainly are more features of this type now than there were at the beginning of the semester, but there still is room for improvement. In almost every campus organization with whom I surveyed and discussed the paper, members wanted more stories about students and the positive things they do.

Readers said they want to know what other students are doing as projects for their majors. They want to know about people doing interesting things. They also want to read about student leaders and what they are doing. These are just a few comments that readers have included on surveys.

Some students have taken a proactive stance toward getting these stories in the paper by bringing the Collegian story ideas. The feature about the two graduate students in kinesiology training as triathletes came from a suggestion brought to the paper by a fellow member of the Tornadoes Triathlon Club. The idea for a story about members of Alpha Tau Omega fraternity tutoring kids around Manhattan was given to the Collegian by a fraternity member.

Students tend to think their interests and activities need to be reported better in the Collegian. I agree with them and encourage the staff to let us know about fellow K-Staters' interesting majors and activities. I also encourage readers to keep sending the paper story ideas.

College life isn't just about events happening on campus. It's about what students are doing, and the Collegian should tell us about those activities.

University should base cola decision on health analysis

Editor,

At the Student Senate meeting Thursday, K-State Associate Vice President Tom Schellhardt talked about the negotiations to exclusively license Pepsi Cola or Coca-Cola. He said he was "interested in what students drink." If so, the university ought to ask the Department of Chemistry for a nutritional analysis of both Pepsi and Coke, compared to water, and publicly base its licensing decision on those results.

Experiences make drinking difficult problem to ignore

Editor,

In his letter to the Collegian on Thursday, "Well-intended advertisements destined to fail for four reasons," Thomas Weatherford writes that "college people are going to drink. Leave it alone. If they drink to excess, so be it." I'm sorry, Weatherford. I can't leave it alone. Maybe not for your sake, but for the sake of others.

On Easter 1997, Nelson and Esther Braune of Kerrville, Texas, were killed in a head-on collision with a drunken driver. They had just left my grandmother's house after a day of family celebration. They were my aunt and uncle. My cousin, Darin, was sitting in the back seat of the car, and escaped with few injuries. As is often the case, the driver of the truck that struck them received only cuts and bruises. Thanks to the efforts of our family, in conjunction with the Bexar County chapter of Mothers Against Drunk Driving, this man was convicted and now is serving a 12-year sentence with little or no chance of parole.

Although the driver of the truck was not a college student, drunken drivers come from all walks of life. Regardless of their race, age, gender, religion, ethnicity, level of education or sexual orientation, they all share two or three things in common: They drink to excess; they get behind the wheel of a vehicle and, eventually, they end up killing somebody. It might not be the first or second time they drive drunk. It might be the 100th time they do it. Eventually, they will kill someone.

More often than not, the murder happens because somebody who saw this person drinking to excess said, "Leave it alone. So be it." Had our esteemed sophomore in mass communications bothered to take advantage of some of the mass media available to him right here on campus, he might have found the K-State News Services Web site, and the Sept. 3 release, "New Survey Shows Most University Students Drink Moderately." The Project Wellness campaign is funded in part by a grant from the Kansas Health Foundation. It has strong research behind it, including proven results at two other universities. According to the release, similar programs resulted in decreased drinking rates at both Northern Illinois University and the University of Arizona.

Besides the benefits to personal health that might result from decreased alcohol consumption, there are societal benefits that might be realized, like lower drunken-driving mortality rates, lower incidents of domestic violence and possibly lower incidents of HIV infection, considering the oft-repeated tales of people who engaged in sexual activity under the influence of alcohol and forgot to take steps to protect themselves.

Yes, I'll admit the Project Wellness approach seems a bit strange to me, too. But it's not completely unfounded. I've talked with Doug Newton, coordinator of the campaign, and he seems like someone who has done his homework. He seems like someone with knowledge about what he's doing. He surveyed the student body of this university, rather than just making generalities about the people he aspires to help. Does he seem like someone who, as you put it, "more than likely drank a lot in college and partied like (a) rock star?" Maybe Weatherford should ask him, before making assumptions about Newton and his colleagues.

At least Weatherford is right about one thing: College is a time of experimentation, of self-discovery. "College is part of growing up and taking responsibility for yourself," as he writes.

I can't think of a better time for you to do that than right now.

K-State running back Joe Hall dives past Baylor safety Sean Armistead (21) into the end zone in the first quarter of Saturday's game. Hall had a total of 109 yards against the Baylor defense.

Injuries could plague Cats' future games

■ Lazetich suffers 2nd concussion of season in game against Baylor.

Now is the critical point in the season. Now is the time when the K-State football team cannot afford to make a mistake. Now is the time where head coach Bill Snyder and the Comeback Cats cannot afford to have another injury or have anyone not playing their best. Now is the time.

As the Wildcats prepare for marquee matchups against Colorado and newly renowned nemesis Nebraska, they find themselves in perfect position. If they win the rest of their games, a national-championship berth is likely and their dreams of national dominance will be fulfilled.

If K-State plays the way it is capable of, the college football world is in the Wildcats' hands for the taking. Nothing can go wrong.

But just when it looked as if the Wildcats were overcoming the loss of Frank Murphy and David Allen and just when Joe Hall was beginning to take shape as a star running back, something did go wrong. Horribly wrong.

In the first quarter of K-State's 48-7 walloping of lowly Baylor, starting fullback Johnno Lazetich suffered his second concussion of the season. Lazetich might not be Jonathan Beasley or Mark Simoneau when it comes to excitement, but this concussion might have the biggest effect on the Cats this season.

After missing two games because of a concussion he suffered against Temple, Lazetich has been playing solidly at fullback for the Wildcats. Lazetich's ability to block with reckless abandon has been a huge asset of the running game.

Lazetich's ability to open holes for Hall and his ability to pass-block effectively has helped ignite a K-State offense that was inconsistent early in the season. Because of Lazetich's crucial blocking, Hall has had three back-to-back 100-yard performances, and Beasley has erupted as a passer, earning Big 12 Offensive Player of the Week honors in a victory over Oklahoma State.

"I think it's been very important," Snyder said of Lazetich's blocking. "Johnno really has made vast improvement from the time he came here up until this point in time."

Lazetich, who transferred from Oregon State, seemed to find his niche in Snyder's complicated offense. He had a personality resembling a fiery, crazed grizzly bear rather than a 240-pound football player from Reno, Nev. Lazetich always gave his all.

Against Kansas, Lazetich ran like a giddy schoolboy, bursting through Jayhawk linemen to score the first touchdown of his career. Life at K-State couldn't have been better for Lazetich.

Then, the concussions came. Lazetich said he suffered memory loss and headaches even after he suffered the blow in the Wildcats' season-opener. Lazetich recovered and came back with the same fire as before, but this time it's possible that Lazetich might not be able to come back.

In a sport where athletes such as Steve Young, Chris Chandler and Chris Miller have suffered numerous concussions, injuries to the head aren't easy to overcome. Of course, there are exceptions to the rule, but the more one gets hit, the easier it is to suffer permanent damage. Especially, as in Lazetich's case, if the player suffers a concussion twice in as many months.

Snyder said the concussion is a grade two (grade one being the least severe), and Lazetich needs an MRI to determine his status and make sure he's free of symptoms.

Snyder said he didn't know if the concussion would end Lazetich's career, but that they are proceeding with caution.

"I don't know," Snyder said. "I have not yet this morning visited with a doctor. We certainly

Wildcats DOMINATE

Team defense shuts down Baylor Bears for 48-7 victory at home

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER

The No. 6 K-State Wildcats failed to pull too many tricks out of the bag on Saturday, the eve of Halloween, but defeated the Baylor Bears 48-7 at KSU Stadium with a grind-it-out style that chewed up the clock.

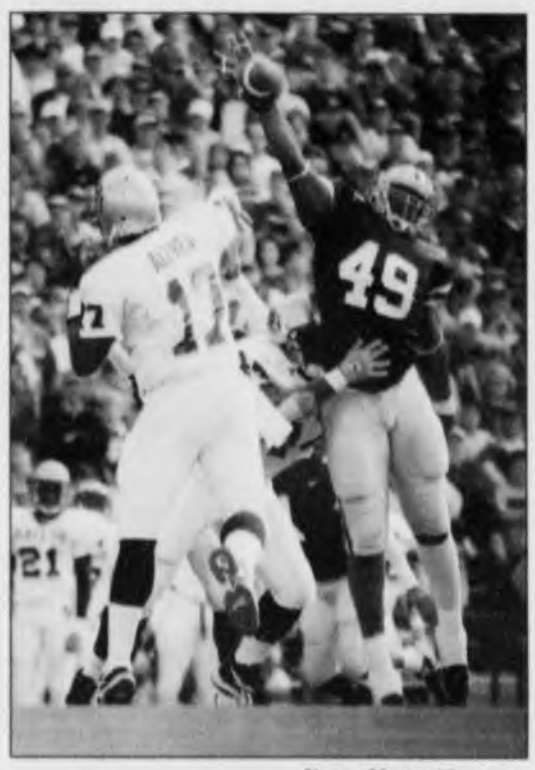
In fact, the Cats (8-0, 5-0) dominated the time of possession by more than 17 minutes and in turn kept the Bears' offensive-play output minimal. The Bears' 49 offensive plays were dwarfed by the Cats' 80. Baylor (1-7, 0-5) was held to 119 total yards, 90 of which came in the second half, as did its lone score.

The Bears' second-half touchdown was, in fact, the first second-half touchdown the Cats' fourth-ranked defense had allowed all season. On the year, K-State has outscored its opponents in the second half 172-10.

Despite the 41-point triumph, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said the defense has to continue to improve.

"I hope we get a little more skip in our steps," Bennett said. "Our scout team has to do a better job. We've got to get better looks. We have to continue to improve."

Head coach Bill Snyder said he thought the Cats were good defensively, but once again the penalties hurt. Late in the game, the Cats' defense held and forced a Baylor punt, but there was a holding penalty on the play that gave the Bears a first down. On the same drive, the defense forced yet another punt, but the return was fumbled and lost by George Williams. Ten plays later, the Bears' Darrell Bush found the end zone.



"I think we were good defensively, until we got a penalty on the punt return and kept them back on the field," Snyder said. "We didn't play very well that particular drive and gave them two big plays.

"I know that we've scored a lot of points in the second half, and gave up very few. I would be extremely proud of the Baylor football team, because that was a 14-7 ball game in the second half, when it would have been so easy to go the other direction, go south, give up and lay down — they didn't. They put a drive together and put the seven points on the board, played well defensively in the second half."

Junior defensive end Monty Beisel said the series was tough on the defense, because it did, in fact, stop the Bears twice in a row on the same possession.

"That was a tough series," Beisel said. "We had stopped them twice that series. Punt team goes out there and gets a hold or whatever, and we had to go back on there. "That's a tough deal. We played good

It could have been a fairy-tale comeback.

Running back David Allen returned to the field for the K-State football team Saturday after a knee injury had sidelined him since the Utah State game, and he came within a penalty of breaking an NCAA record. It could have been the stuff of which great stories are made.

With less than four minutes remaining in the third quarter, it seemed the fairy tale had become reality.

After Baylor again failed to convert on third down, Allen was back to receive Kyle Atteberry's punt. He caught the ball cleanly and jetted for the end zone. Sixty-one yards later he broke the plane, and the NCAA record for most punts returned for touchdowns in a career — or so it appeared.

There was a flag on the play.

The Cats were called for an illegal block from behind, sending the ball back to their 39, and Allen

Volleyball team falls to 2nd in conference after loss

BY NABIL SHAHEEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A record crowd of 5,122 jammed into Ahearn Field House on Saturday night hoping to watch the K-State women's volleyball team defeat Nebraska for only the second time in school history.

But the Huskers (17-5, 9-3) would be too much, downing K-State 15-9, 15-10 and 15-6.

Although momentum shifted back and forth throughout the contest, the Cats never had true control of their game.

"Tonight we started having some hitting errors and service errors and a lack of communication at times," middle blocker Jayne Christen said. "And it was at crucial points in the match when momentum could have shifted our way. If you have unforced errors it's hard to come back and win."

K-State (15-5, 9-3) was led by senior outside hitter Dawn Cady, who posted her 10th double-double this season with 14 kills and 16 digs.

Sophomore setter Disney Bronnenberg — who is second in the conference and fifth in the NCAA, averaging 14.25 assists per game — had 30 of the team's 31 assists.

"The thing with us is that we created real well but we weren't converting at a high enough percentage," head coach Jim McLaughlin said. "That was the problem with us tonight."

Pacing the Huskers was junior outside hitter Nancy Meendering, with 15 kills. As a team, Nebraska had a .373 attack average.

"When I look at the numbers, they played great," McLaughlin said. "They sided out at a really high level. The thing that's disappointing is we had some opportunities, and I thought we made some errors at bad times."

The Cats have dropped three of the past four matches, all against Big 12 opponents.

"We're playing fine, we're not playing horrible," Cady said. "We're just having a hard time right now getting strings of points ourselves and finishing games. We just score one and that's it. We've got to keep getting strings of points. We've got to keep going until we get 15 and not quitting halfway."

K-State now slips into a three-way tie in second place as Texas takes sole possession of first place in the conference.

Hoping to avoid their first three-match losing streak of the year, the Cats will be host to Colorado on Wednesday night at Ahearn.

Women finish 2nd in Big 12 cross country

BY SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Colorado swept the Big 12 Men's and Women's Cross Country Championship with wins on both sides this weekend. The K-State women's team placed second, while the men's placed ninth.

The Cats were led by junior Korene Hinds, who placed third; freshman Amy Mortimer, who placed fourth; and junior Brandon Jessop, who placed seventh. Each of these Cats earned All-Big 12 Conference honors.

"I feel pretty good about how I ran," Hinds said. "I was pleased with my performance. At first I stayed up with their (Colorado's) top runner, but she started pulling away probably when we got to the 2K or 3K."

Head coach Randy Cole said the field of runners was stronger this year than last, when the women won the Big 12.

"I thought we ran very aggressively," Cole said. "We had some very strong finishes, passing several down the last half mile. Colorado ran very fast.

"We held off their top-four runners pretty well, but they do score five. A great conference race this year. We had a better team (than last year), but it is also a better conference."

Hinds said she knew Colorado was strong this year, having competed against the team once before this season in the pre-NCAA meet.

"Colorado was not a surprise. We knew that they had a good team so it wasn't a surprise," Hinds said. "I didn't feel disappointed because as I see it, may the best team win, and I guess Colorado came out to be the best team, and they won, so I wasn't disappointed."

Hinds said the meet gives the women's team confidence going into the final meets of the season.

"It tells us that we can go there and surprise some of those teams that are ranked ahead of us," Hinds said.

The men's team, led by Jessop and followed by junior Jean-Paul Niyongabo at 10th, entered the meet without a defense, eventually they got after us, we broke down, missed some tackles, and got in the zone."

The Cats were led offensively by Joe Hall once again on the ground. For the third game in a row, Hall managed to rush for at least 100 yards.

He's the first running back to accomplish the feat since J.J. Smith in 1994. Against the Bears, Hall ran 23 times for 109 yards and a first-quarter touchdown.

Quarterback Jonathan Beasley led the offense. For the second week in a row, Beasley put together another solid performance. As a follow-up to his 311-yard performance last week against Oklahoma State, Beasley completed 10 of 16 first-half passes for 118 yards and one touchdown. He also rushed for 55 yards and another score, staking K-State to a 34-0 halftime lead.

"Jonathan has made a lot of progress," Snyder said. "As I said last week, I was happy with the way he practiced two weeks ago, prior to the Oklahoma State game. I thought that was the best week of practice he ever had.

"I thought this week was along the same line. He practiced well and was focused about what he was doing. He's throwing the ball more accurately. For the most part, I think he made a few mistakes this week than he did last week, but by and large, I thought he played well."

"I hope we get a little more skip in our steps. Our scout team has to do a better job. We've got to get better looks. We have to continue to improve."

— Phil Bennett, defensive coordinator

With the return of running back and punt-return specialist David Allen, questions have arisen on what will happen when Frank Murphy returns to join Hall and Allen. Who is the starter? Will Hall be the starter even with Murphy and Allen edging closer to full strength?

"I think going into this ball game I might have felt that way," Snyder said. "I'm not sure right now that I do. That some evaluation and some thought will go into that.

"I think that whoever deserves to be there will be there. And I would say, you've got three pretty decent running backs and nobody going to sit all day on the bench, I don't think."

Murphy's return might not be the question anymore; it's more along the lines of when he will return. Murphy began practicing last week and suited up against the Bears. Snyder did, in fact, say he didn't see Murphy playing against Baylor.

With that in mind, Colorado looms next week.

"He's been out there running around a little bit. He could be back, but that depends on the next three or four days," offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said.

back in pursuit of the record.

Allen said it was not as big a comeback game as he might have liked, noting the nullified touchdown run. He said it would have been better had the touchdown counted.

"That would have been perfect, but, unfortunately, it didn't," he said.

Even with the touchdown called back, Allen found himself in the end zone three times Saturday. With 8:32 left in the second quarter, Allen ran 3 yards for a touchdown before catching a 14-yard scoring pass from Jonathan Beasley with 21 seconds remaining in the half to put the Cats up 34-0. Allen capped his scoring with a 4-yard third-quarter run that gave the Cats a 41-0 lead.

Allen's return, although marked with scoring opportunities, was not flawless to him. He said there were some nervous jitters, evident when he fumbled early in the first quarter.

"It was a little shaky in the beginning," Allen said, "because I didn't really know how my knee would feel, or if I got hit in the leg how it would hold up, or how it would feel after the hit. But after that, I just loosened up a little bit, and I was ready to go."

Allen was credited with 10 rushing yards on five carries and gained another 87 yards on returns.

Allen said he was glad to be back in the game.

"It felt great," he said. "I just wanted really to see how my knee would hold up. You know, in practice things aren't full-scale all the time."

would not allow him to do anything that would put him in any serious jeopardy."

Jeopardy, though, is now the name of the game for Lazetich and the Wildcats. Lazetich, whose enthusiasm and work ethic are irreplaceable, could miss an indefinite amount of time. As the Nov. 13 showdown with Nebraska moves near, time is something the Wildcats don't have.

Hall was Lazetich's replacement earlier in the year. With Murphy and Allen still nursing injuries, the Wildcats can't afford to use Hall at fullback. Backup fullbacks Ryan Payne and Eric Gooden are reliable, but lack experience.

No matter what happens, I have full confidence that Snyder will find a solution. Hall might be a blocker once again when Murphy is healthy, or the Wildcats might rely on a one-back set.

Regardless of the options, though, the damage has been done.

The Wildcats take a blow by losing their best blocking back. More importantly, though, the tenacious Lazetich takes an even bigger one.

K-State will recover from this. Lazetich might not be so lucky.

At the most critical time in the season, the Wildcats suffer a setback in an already-long season of setbacks. But, if history is any indication, one wouldn't be wise to give up on a Wildcat.

So fully expect Lazetich and his teammates to bounce back from this one and engineer yet another game-winning comeback.

Game notes

■ The streak remains alive

The nation's top-ranked pass defense of the Cats proved itself once again when Dyshod Carter intercepted one of Jermaine Alfred's passes on Baylor's first drive of the second half to extend K-State's streak of consecutive games with an interception to 16.

■ Moving up

David Allen returned five punts for 87 yards to move him into third all-time in the nation in return yards. He needs 26 more yards to move into second place, passing Texas Tech's Tyrone Thurman from 1985 to 88. Allen needs just 155 yards to become the NCAA all-time leader.

■ Kicking to the top

Place kicker Jamie Rheem kicked two field goals against the Bears, pushing his streak of consecutive field goals to 13, which is a school record for one season. He also tied Martin Gramatica for the school record of consecutive field goals made in a career.

■ Rushing to wins

K-State rushed for 225 yards against Baylor and improved to a perfect 40-0 in the 1990s when rushing for at least 200 yards in a game.

national ranking. Cole said the meet beyond Colorado was unpredictable.

"The guys ran well together, but they were just too far back," Cole said. "They have been working hard, but just were not strong enough up front. Brandon had a great start and race all the way through. Jean-Paul struggled in the middle of the race, but came back to finish strong."

Sophomore Istvan Nagy echoed Cole's sentiments and said the men will just have to try to improve as much as possible.

"We placed ninth, and I think last year we were fifth, so I don't think it's a good phase for the team," Nagy said. "But I think we tried everything we could. We have one more meet left, so you try to improve if you can."

The men's team has struggled this season with injuries and illness on the part of their top runners. Jessop was out part of the season before returning to the field.

"I went out real conservatively and tried to gauge the other runners," Jessop said. "I was in the top five at the 5,000-meter mark, but then fell back. I felt with the amount of training I had, I competed very well."

Relationship of K-State alumni featured on Learning Channel

BY TRACY DOILE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Love is patient. So were Marilyn and Denton Nichols, two K-State alumni, after applying to appear on "A Wedding Story."

After six months of contact with the popular Learning Channel show, Marilyn and Denton Nichols were chosen to be a featured couple.

After Denton Nichols proposed on March 27, the couple sent a write-up about themselves and a picture to the show in April.

"We sent them the story about how we met, how we fell in love and why we'd like to be on TV," Marilyn Nichols said.

Marilyn Nichols said they didn't hear back from the show until Sept. 1.The show then requested more information, such as how long the two had been together, how long they had been engaged, when and where they bought the dress and the ring, and the ups and downs of their relationship. Video footage of how the two interacted also was requested.

"They wanted a lot of information," Marilyn Nichols said. "They just wanted to see what we were like together."

The couple met in Manhattan, so they sent the show footage of them attending the K-State vs. Temple football game this year.

"The Wednesday after the Temple game, they got back with us," Denton Nichols said. "You tell some very intimate details about your relationship to complete strangers in hopes to be chosen."

Marilyn Nichols said it was the second week of September when the show called and notified the two they had been selected.

The couple's episode will air Dec. 14 as a pilot show with a new format, Denton Nichols said. He said he thinks it will tell more about who the people are rather than just the wedding.

"It seems like they asked about childhood stuff, not just the wedding," he said.

Some footage for the show was taped in Manhattan on Thursday. The couple returned to Danenberg Jewelers, where they bought the wedding rings. They also visited the K-State campus; Rock-A-Belly Deli, one of their favorite restaurants; and the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area, where Denton Nichols had proposed. More was taped Friday and on the actual wedding date.

"You tell some very intimate details about your relationship to complete strangers in hopes to be chosen."

— Denton Nichols K-State alumnus

The couple were married Saturday in Baldwin City, Kan., at the First United Methodist Church.

Denton Nichols, who graduated in 1995 with a bachelor of science in architecture and design, works for Sabatini Associates, an architecture firm in Lawrence. Marilyn Nichols graduated with a education degree in 1995, and she earned her master's degree in curriculum and instruction in 1997. She is an instructor at Haskell Indian Nations University.

Marilyn Nichols said the show only gives the couple an edited version of the show that is aired. Nevertheless, she said she is excited about the show because the two are not from Manhattan, and this is a way for their relatives to see highlights of their wedding.

"It's a good chance to express our love story. We really feel it's unique," Marilyn Nichols said.

ABOVE Marilyn Hetzel and Denton Nichols have been chosen as feature couple to be married on "A Wedding Story." The wedding will be on Saturday, and the show will air on The Learning Channel on Dec. 14.

LEFT Marilyn Hetzel and Denton Nichols, graduates of K-State, stand in the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area where Denton proposed. The couple's marriage will air on "A Wedding Story."

4 teens deny making plans for rampage

BY THOMAS J. SHEERAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CLEVELAND — Four white ninth-graders accused of making plans for a racially motivated rampage at their predominantly black high school pleaded innocent Sunday and were sent back to a juvenile lockup.

The boys, one 14 years old and the rest 15, were accompanied by their parents and arraigned separately in front of Cuyahoga County Juvenile Court Magistrate Dick Walsh in closed hearings.

They allegedly planned to set off bombs and open fire on classmates at noon Friday.

The hearings were in a room on the ground floor of the Cuyahoga County Detention Center. The four will continue to be kept there.

They were kept out of sight from the public. Reporters were allowed to see the hearing room but were ushered outside the building before the arraignments began.

Larry Zukerman, an attorney representing one boy, emerged from the arraignments upset that the names and photos of the boys have appeared in print and on television. Juvenile court proceedings, by law, are confidential in Ohio.

"The identities of the juveniles are supposed to remain confidential," Zukerman said.

Dan Bailey said after the arraignment for his stepson, Adam Gruber, that the boy is well-behaved, respectful and never would get involved in violence.

Lafene to celebrate 40-year anniversary of on-campus service with cake, punch, tours

BY COURTNEY DUFFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lafene Health Center will celebrate 40 years of on-campus services Tuesday.

"It's mainly a celebration. Lafene has been here since 1959," personnel director Shecky Davis said.

Davis said the celebration will be in Lafene's main lobby. Cake and punch will be provided, and members of the Student Health Advisory Committee will give tours of Lafene.

"SHAC members will be offering tours throughout the building," said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion.

Kennedy said information about the different medical services at Lafene will be available to the campus community.

"Within each department, there will be department staff members to answer specific questions. Students who do not necessarily use Lafene on a regular basis might not know what services are available to them," Kennedy said. "Health care is an important part of their well-being, and I encounter a lot of students that say they will not go to Lafene, but an unexpected illness and the inability to get an appointment at a community facility bring them to Lafene."

There also will be information about Lafene's history at the celebration.

Kennedy said health care started on campus in 1912, and students paid 50 cents each semester for the services. Kennedy also said that in 1913, the first physician-provided care was on the second floor of Anderson Hall.

In 1920, there was a need for an isolation hospital, so health care moved into an old two-story building, Kennedy said.

The hospital was in the northeast corner of campus, near what is now the University Physical Plant.

Kennedy said the hospital moved and added facilities throughout the years. She said it became obvious that the hospital needed a larger and more permanent facility because of an increase in the student population at K-State after World Wars I and II, combined with influenza and polo epidemics.

Lafene was completed in 1959 and was named after Benjamin Lafene. In 1987, the building became an outpatient care facility instead of a hospital. In 1988, outpatient care merged with University Counseling Services.

"Dr. Lafene served as the hospital administrator, and it was because of his efforts that Lafene was eventually built," Kennedy said. "We used to be a hospital. We used to have a cafeteria and inpatient care, and students spent the night here."

Kennedy said it is important for students to know about the kinds of services Lafene offers, because when students come to college, parents no longer are around to help them take care of their health.

"Students eventually will learn that health care is a necessary part of their lives and to be more responsible for their health, " Kennedy said.

Bringing in the harvest

STORY BY SAM STIERS ■ PHOTOGRAPHS BY JEFF COOPER

Doug French cuts through a soybean field on a late September evening. Harvest began in mid-September and lasted until late October for French. French plants half his acreage with corn and the other half with soybeans, rotating the crops every two years.

As twilight falls, Doug French continues to work on his soybean field west of Rossville, Kan. During harvest, French works long hours into the night in order to get the crop in while the weather holds.

Doug and Denise French share a kiss goodbye as he heads back to the field. Denise helps with the farm work by driving grain trucks and bringing Doug dinner in the field.

The sun sets on the Kansas River near Doug French's farm. This was French's 25th harvest since he began farming in the Kansas River valley.

Long hours, dedicated work yield 1,250 acres of crops in late October

Leaves are just beginning to turn colors Sept. 10. Fall is on its way.

Trees shed their leaves, and squirrels hoard acorns as they prepare for the lean times ahead. While most of nature prepares to shut down, the fields of Kansas spring to life.

Combines around the state awaken from their hibernation. Seas of crops sway in anticipation. On Sept. 10, Doug French started a process that will sustain himself and his family for another year: the harvest has begun.

French farms 1,250 acres one mile southwest of Rossville, in the Kansas River valley. Harvest will last until late October as French and three others cut 50 acres a day for six weeks.

"Harvest is a stressful time from a management standpoint," French said. "You always have to look ahead and make sure the weather will hold and you can get done on time."

It is his 25th harvest, and French said this year's crop is better than he expected.

"We had a real wet spring that drowned out some acres," French said. "Then we had a dry summer. But we're blessed down here in the valley. At least here we can irrigate."

French owns 300 acres of fertile land in the valley. He rents the other 950 acres he farms, and they too are in the valley. He has not always been so fortunate.

"I started farming on all rented land," French said. "It was so competitive. I farmed everything, even the rocky high ground."

French had a goal — to farm 1,000 acres of rich bottom land within five miles of his home. He accomplished that goal 10 years ago.

Competition is high in the Kansas River valley. Most of the farmers in the valley are professional, and they race to finish harvest first. A farmer can usually get a better price for his crops the sooner he gets them to market.

"Down here in the valley, we have soils that dry out earlier," French said. "That means we can harvest earlier and get to market first. Everyone seems wired in the valley. They do a good job and the competition is very high."

Doug French's wife, Denise, said the competition can get out of control as farmers vie to become the first to finish.

"It's stressful enough to produce a good crop without the competitiveness," Denise French said.

She said her husband works hard all year, and during harvest time he doesn't sleep well.

"Doug puts in a lot of hours," Denise French said. "He doesn't get any time off in the summer, and during harvest he often wakes up in the middle of the night. He just gets up and works the fields."

Harvest time is a stressful time, but Doug French says it is a fulfilling time as well. The Frenchs see the culmination of a year of hard work.

"Doug can get very stressed, but at the harvest time, you can see the light at the end of the tunnel. A year of hard work is paying off."

— DENISE FRENCH

"It's a satisfying time," Doug French said. "I love running the combine and seeing the product of my labor come through."

"Doug can get very stressed," Denise French said. "But at harvest time, you can see the light at the end of the tunnel. A year of hard work is paying off."

Doug French said this year's harvest went well. The fall's mild weather and dry conditions allowed him to harvest the crops quickly and comfortably.

"It was a very nice and enjoyable harvest," he said. "There's no A.C. in the trucks, so the good weather keeps the drivers happy, which is important, because one of them is my wife."

He harvests two crops. He plants half his acreage with corn and the other half with soybeans, rotating the crops every two years.

"Most farmers were satisfied with their yields in the bottoms," he said. "I got a good, average yield this year."

Doug French produced 160 bushels of corn per acre and 55 bushels of soybeans per acre.

Theater tour provides 'City of Angels' preview

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Anyone who might donate several hundred dollars to K-State Theatre probably would like to know exactly how that money is being used.

A behind-the-scenes tour of K-State Theatre gave patrons and donors a chance to see how their dollars were being used, as well as get a sneak peek at the making of the upcoming production, "City of Angels," a musical comedy running Nov. 18-20.

MORE INFO? "City of Angels" opens Nov. 18 and runs through Nov. 20. For more information, contact K-State Theatre at 532-6875.

The tour, led by Marci Maullar, associate professor of speech communication, theater and dance, began with a viewing of a rehearsal of "City of Angels."

Doug Hosney, 1982 K-State alumnus, is helping with the show as production stage manager. Hosney works on Broadway in "It Ain't Nuthin' But the Blues."

Maullar said it is an honor to have Hosney work with the theater department.

"It's been amazing to watch him work," Maullar said.

Hosney addressed the tour during the rehearsal and said thus far he has enjoyed his experience working on Broadway, working alongside such actors as Avery Brooks, better known for his lead role on the TV series "Star Trek: Deep Space Nine."

"Avery Brooks is one of the most highly trained actors I've ever worked with," Hosney said.

Hosney said that he values his ties to Kansas, and that he is impressed by the work of everyone involved in "City of Angels."

"I want to stay connected to Kansas. I have roots here, and it's good to see what's gone on here," he said.

Hosney also said it is not uncommon to see actors from Kansas on the big stage.

"You run into people all the time from Kansas, and even K-State," he said. "It's a very small world."

The tour then went to McCain Auditorium's costume shop, where costume designer Dana Pinkston displayed a few of the 100 costumes used in "City of Angels."

Pinkston, also a K-State graduate, said the costume shop stays busy year-round.

"The costume shop does construction for the five main stage shows per year," she said, "and each year, we produce over 300 costumes."

The costume shop employs 10 stitchers, mostly students, who put in as much as nine hours of work each week preparing the costumes for the various productions.

"We train the stitchers as they go along," Pinkston said. "By their senior year, they're top-notch stitchers. We've got a great staff this year."

Pinkston said she got her inspiration for the costumes for the show, which is a story about the Hollywood film industry in the late 1940s, from many vintage magazines, books and movies.

Down the hall from the costume shop was the tour's next stop, the scene and paint shop, where 17-foot high backdrops, or "flats," were being constructed for the show by Karen Hoffman, set designer, and Scott Hansen, technical director.

Hoffman said the flats being used in "City of Angels" mostly are hand-painted replicas of 1940s movie posters and that each backdrop relates to a specific scene in the play in one way or another.

Hoffman said she first had to build a miniature model of the theater in McCain to see how her backdrops and movable scenery, or "wagons," would fit onto the stage. With construction nearly complete on the wagons, backdrops and other props, the technical rehearsals for "City of Angels," in which cast and crew members interact with each other and the scenery to rehearse the finished product, begin this week.

The tour ended in Nichols Theatre, where John Uthoff, associate professor of speech communication, theatre and dance, gave a presentation about the history of lighting and sound in the theater, and its various uses.

"Lighting and sound are the newer fields in theater history," Uthoff said. "They didn't become possible until the advent of the computer in the late 1960s and early '70s."

Uthoff gave several demonstrations of the various types of lighting used in stage productions, pointing out that certain instruments can add color and designs to the lighting, making for a more entertaining experience.

Former local favorite to make return to roots in Aggieville

BY NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On Thursday, Manhattan will have the chance to listen to a band that once was an Aggieville regular.

Back Porch Mary will return to Manhattan to perform where it got its start.

"We're really excited to play in Manhattan again," Mike Krug, lead vocalist and guitarist, said. "Manhattan is a really good place to be, to play."

The band, originally formed in 1992, was put together while its members attended school at K-State. They played the local scene and after finding much success decided to move where the music industry was centered.

Austin, Texas, became their destination.

In 1997, soon after establishing itself in Austin, the band broke up.

"The band everybody knew about in Manhattan broke up," Krug said. "I had to put a completely new band together."

Breaking up after just signing to a new record label put the pressure on Krug to find new band members. But soon after two of the original members left, two new ones signed on — Craig Bagby, drummer and vocalist, and Troy Wilson, bass player.

With the band together again, Back Porch Mary was ready for showtime.

"I found the right people," Krug said. "It's the best band I have ever played with. We're like a team, like a family."

The band since has been performing regularly in such states as Colorado, Missouri, Iowa, Louisiana, and of course, Texas and Kansas. With more than 300 bars in Austin that promote rock shows, Back Porch Mary also has been a regular to the bar scene.

Now, with a broader scope of fans under its belt and an increased amount of radio play, Back Porch Mary is ready to get out and tour. The band will be promoting its new songs and soon-to-to-be-released single. The band's hopes are to have a new album recorded and released by sometime in January, Krug said.

"We're just getting out and playing, seeing how people will respond to our new songs," Krug said.

He said the songs incorporate the band's everyday life and what it goes through in the music business and on the road.

"It's just about us, whatever good or bad events happen to us," Krug said. "Just our everyday life."

Mary Minter, president of Austin Music International Inc., described the band as having an authentic sound and expression and said its energy set it apart from all other bands.

"It's their energy," Minter said. "The integrity that they bring to the style of music and the professionalism they demonstrate."

The band describes itself as just a rock band.

"We're just a rock band. That's the easiest way to describe it," Krug said. "Rock 'n' roll with a lot of influences."

The band will take the stage at Rusty's Last Chance, Restaurant & Saloon around 10:30 p.m. and will play until close.

"Visually, musically, lyrically, the whole show will be entertainment," Minter said. "They are extremely skilled and talented."

Krug said the band is really looking forward to getting back to playing in Manhattan.

"It's definitely time to party," Krug said. "And we're a band to do that with."

Live's new album, 'The Distance to Here,' offers walk on wild side for listeners

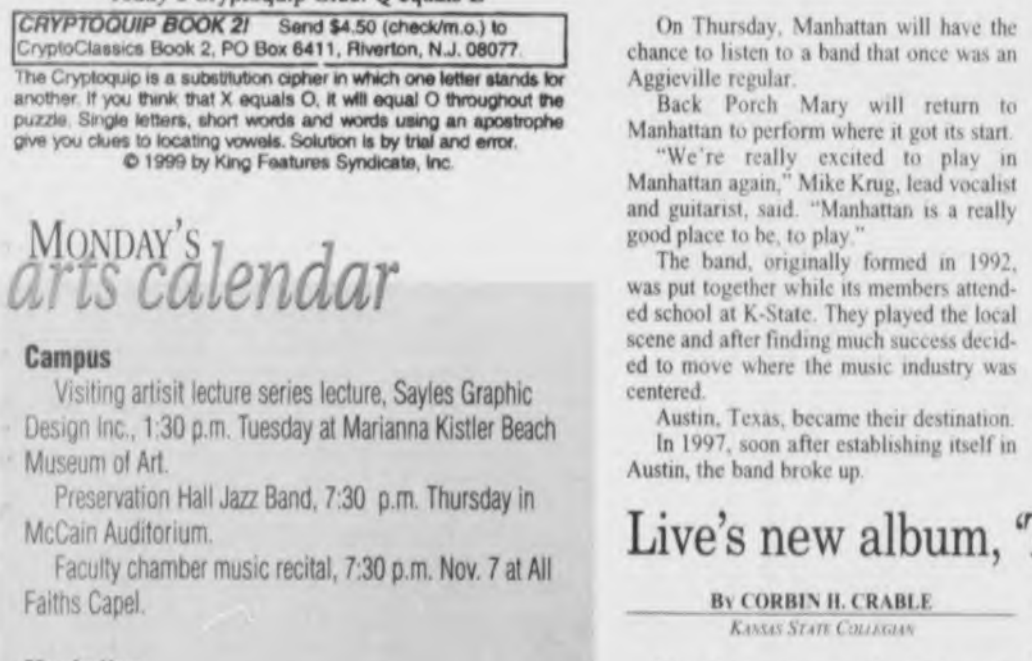
BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Music lovers now can take another walk on the wild side when they listen to Live's new album, "The Distance to Here."

Music Review ★★★½

Released by Radioactive Records, the Pennsylvania-based band's latest masterpiece is a mixture of stunning instrumentals and lyrics that without a doubt will invoke thought and emotion in those who listen.

On most of the tracks, the drums of Chad Gracey have a dominant voice and create an energetic duo when paired with Chad Taylor's lead guitar. When they want to be, Gracey and Taylor have the ability to portray emotions ranging from rage to angst through their music.



Likewise, the lyrics, written by Edward Kowalczyk, vocalist and guitarist, contain many themes, including lost love, environmental conservation and religion and spirituality. One of the more interesting tracks, "Voodoo Lady," deals with the subject of lust and prostitution. The lyrics tell the tale of a man who is mesmerized by a woman he barely knows and afraid of his own feelings. The lyrics to this song come from the point of view of the prostitute's patron and convey the feelings of a man both consumed by lust and confusion: "Voodoo lady/I was thirsty for blood, wasn't my style/voodoo lady/Did I dream you up, or are you for real?"

In nearly all facets of the album, though, the word is "drama." Both the in-your-face, powerful instrumentals and the haunting, bleak lyrics largely present different ideas in a dramatic way, which has proven to be largely effective with Live in the past. The group's success and album sales are evidence of this.

Live's debut album, "Mental Jewelry," hit stores in 1991, and its album "Throwing Copper," appeared on store shelves five years later, selling more than 6 million copies in the United States alone.

Apparently, Live is doing something right. Whatever that might be, I definitely hope they continue.

HOMECOMING

was one of the most anticipated events of Homecoming, Haney said.

"Pant the Chant is one of the most fun things because of all the energy that comes along with it," Haney said.

Marlatt and West won the Pant the Chant competition for the residence halls, the collaboration of Chi Omega, Delta Chi and Phi Gamma Delta won for the greek organizations and BSU won for campus organizations.

"We were all really excited about Pant the Chant," said Kelly Woodward, junior in speech pathology and Chi Omega member. "We were nervous though because everyone did a great job."

During Fright Night, Thursday, Bramlage Coliseum was filled with ghosts and goblins flocking to receive candy and to interact with the men's and women's basketball teams. Members of greek houses, residence halls and various campus organizations passed out candy to trick-or-treaters and won awards for creative exhibits. Marlatt and West won for the residence halls and the collaboration of Chi Omega, Delta Chi, and Phi Gamma Delta won for the greek division.

On Friday the campus was purple, not only because it was Purple Pride Day, but because it was one of the last and biggest days of Homecoming.

"Friday, everyone was asked to wear purple in recognition of Homecoming and to show spirit for the pep rally and the parade," Haney said.

In Friday's Homecoming parade, residence halls, greek houses and campus organizations entered floats into competitions. Marlatt and West won the parade competition for the residence halls, and there was a tie between the collaboration of Alpha Xi Delta, Beta Theta Pi and Lambda Chi Alpha and the collaboration of Pi Beta Phi, Delta Upsilon and Sigma Chi for the greek division.

At the pep rally and bonfire after the parade, the campus showed its enthusiasm and excitement for the weekend and for the football game against Baylor University on Saturday.

"I was excited the whole week," Kristen Fisher, freshman in open-option, said. "My sorority had so many things to do, so I was really busy all week long."

The overall winners of the homecoming competitions were announced at the Pep Rally.

The winners were Marlatt and West halls for the residence halls, a tie between the collaboration of Alpha Xi Delta, Beta Theta Pi and Lambda Chi Alpha and the collaboration of Pi Beta Phi, Delta Upsilon and Sigma Chi for the greek division, and BSU for the campus organizations.

The new K-State Ambassadors were announced at halftime of the football game.

"I was not expecting to be elected an Ambassador, but when I heard my name called it was such a great feeling," said Erica Guries, sophomore in international business and marketing.

Casey Clark, junior in pre-medicine and biology, also was elected Ambassador and said he felt surprised and privileged to be chosen.

"I had no clue that I would be elected," Clark said. "But it is a great honor, and I am excited to spread purple pride as an ambassador."

Haney said the week went by quickly but not without an abundance of Wildcat Spirit.

"This year we chose a truly appropriate title for homecoming. Ninety-nine really was Wildcat Time," Haney said.

EGYPT

Alan Lewis, chief executive of the Boston-based travel agency Grand Circle Corp., said most of the group members were from Colorado, Arizona and the Pacific Northwest.

The plane started its flight in Los Angeles and stopped at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport. It took off again at 12:19 a.m. CST and went down at 12:52 a.m., roughly 60 miles south of Nantucket. The Coast Guard deployed ships, reconnaissance planes and helicopters to search an area of about 36 square miles, in waters about 270 feet deep.

State-owned EgyptAir, confronted with the worst crash in its history, said non-American passengers included 62 Egyptians, two Sudanese, three Syrians and one Chilean. There were 18 crew members, EgyptAir said.

It was the fourth time in three years that an extensive search operation was launched in the region for a plane lost at sea. The series of crashes began with TWA Flight 800 off Long Island in July 1996, followed by Swissair Flight 111 off Nova Scotia in September 1998 and the single-engine plane carrying John F. Kennedy Jr., his wife and her sister off Martha's Vineyard in July.

EgyptAir Chairman Mohammed Fahim Rayan was asked about reports that the Federal Aviation Administration had warned EgyptAir of a terrorist threat.

"We take all precautions and we have plenty of warnings from everybody, including the FAA," he said.

Armed security guards routinely fly on EgyptAir flights. After the airline's passengers go through the normal airport security check, they again are subjected to baggage search just before they board the aircraft.

At the Cairo airport, sobs echoed though a restaurant where officials set up an information center for passengers' relatives.

A man in his 60s found a familiar name on a passenger list and collapsed into a chair, crying out, "My son, my son."

Similar wrenching scenes unfolded at the Ramada Plaza Hotel near Kennedy airport, where more than 20 relatives were consoled by Red Cross workers, Muslim clerics and even New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani.

"It's horrible in there. Everybody's crying, everybody is in mourning," Mahmoud Hamza, who lost two friends on the flight, said as he fought back tears.

A Canadian newspaper, La Presse in Montreal, said one of its executives and his wife were aboard. Deputy publisher Claude Masson and his wife, Jeannine Bourdages, both 58, were headed on vacation.

Flight 990 began its precipitous descent at 12:50 a.m. while flying at 33,000 feet. Hall said the plane dropped about 14,000 feet over the next 36 seconds, and the last radar signal was at 12:52 a.m.

That rate of descent would indicate the plane was almost out of control, said Michael Barr, head of the aviation safety program at the University of Southern California. The slower descent rate after 19,100 feet could indicate an in-flight breakup, investigators suggested.

Weather at Nantucket was clear with 9 miles of visibility and wind of 9 mph, the National Weather Service said. The Coast Guard reported gentle seas.

HARVEST

He fared better than the average Kansas farmer.

Mike Miller, agriculture statistician for the Kansas Department of Agriculture, said farmers around the state averaged 142 bushels of corn an acre and 27 bushels of soybeans an acre.

"The hot weather hit soybeans pretty hard this year," Miller said. "If farmers couldn't irrigate, then their crops didn't do very well."

Doug French agreed with Miller and said location is an important factor in quality and quantity of crops.

"Yields in the valley were pretty good this year," he said. "People in the hills didn't fair as well. Most people only got 15 to 20 bushels of soybeans per acre and 85 to 100 bushels of corn per acre. It's very advantageous here in the valley. We have fertile soil and the ability to irrigate it."

After the crops are cut, the most important part of the harvest comes: payday.

Doug French hauls his crops 17 miles to Topeka, where he says the market is better. French said this year's market was low, especially for soybeans.

He received $4.30 a bushel for soybeans this year.

"Government deficiency payments help make up for low prices," Doug French said. "The payments this year got the target price of soybeans up to $5.32 a bushel. The target price for corn this year was $1.93 a bushel."

Harvest ends when the last bushel is shipped to market. However, the work is hardly over. First the Frenchs must catch up on the bills, mail and government paperwork that has been accumulating over the past month. Doug French then tills the soil and prepares it for planting he will do next year. When the paperwork is done and the soil is ready for winter, he reviews the harvest.

"Doug goes over how each acre performed and what worked and what didn't," Denise French said. "He works hard and reviews everything."

When the final acre is looked at, and all the results from the harvest reviewed, the Frenchs take some time off. Denise said the two like to travel and relax during the winter. Harvest is over. Leaves that began turning colors in September now blanket the ground. Kansas fields are bare, and combines are put back to sleep.

Cold weather is on the horizon. For farmers all over Kansas, another harvest is complete, and they wait for spring, when life will begin again.

City offers multitude of trick-or treating opportunities

BY LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Children in Manhattan were offered a multitude of trick-or-treating opportunities this weekend. Not only could they go door-to-door Sunday night, but the city also had two different ways kids could trick-or-treat in the daytime.

Trick-or-Treat in Aggieville and Spooktacular '99 at Sunset Zoological Park were trick-or-treating alternatives. Each event drew record numbers.

On Friday, Aggieville was hopping with activities. It was the start of another touchdown weekend, this time with something extra.

Area kids were invited to trick-or-treat the Aggieville businesses all afternoon. Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said this was the 10th year Aggieville has offered this service, and it went well.

"We had hundreds and hundreds of kids. This has been the biggest year yet," Sieben said.

What made the day even more busy was the pairing of K-State's Homecoming and Halloween. When everyone was exhausted from carrying their huge bags of candy, they could sit down and relax as they watched the Homecoming parade make its way through the streets of Aggieville.

The crowds got even thicker at the start of the parade. K-State students came to Aggieville to watch the parade also.

"It was really fun, even though it was pretty crowded with all the kids and their parents and all the students," Malissa DeWald, freshman in musical theater, said.

Merchant owners also said they thought the event was successful.

"I thought it was one of our best years. It wasn't just little kids either. The weather was cooperative with us, and the parade really added to it. All the merchants really got into it. It was a real festive kind of atmosphere," Ilene Meyer, manager of Streetside Records, said.

On Saturday and Sunday kids could go to Sunset Zoo to get even more candy and goodies from local businesses.

Spooktacular '99, now in its fifth year, was an opportunity for kids to follow the zoo's three trails to get candy, while pausing to see all the animals.

"We were looking for a fun activity for the whole family and we really like coming to the zoo," Donice James, Manhattan resident, said.

There were also costume contests with prizes for winners on both days. Some of the more popular costumes were from "Star Wars: Episode One" and a variety of princesses, ghosts and witches.

Another contest, the Stuffed Shirt Scarecrow contest, required families to create scarecrows in order to win hockey tickets.

Multimedia Cablevision sponsored a Creepy Kids Carnival for children who trick-or-treated at the zoo.

Heidi Kautz, gate attendant at Sunset Zoo, said the crowds were huge. Forty-five minutes after opening on Sunday, more than 100 people had gone through, she said.

Although area children already had gotten lots of candy at the city-sponsored events, the streets still were bustling with kids in costume on Halloween night.

"I wouldn't skip nighttime trick-or-treating. It's fun," said Zack Phillips, a trick-or-treater visiting his cousins.

South Korean fire that killed 55 blamed on poor safety standards

BY SANG-HUN CHOE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

INCHON, South Korea — South Korea's deadliest fire in a quarter-century was a disaster waiting to happen, in an unlicensed beer bar so crowded that waitresses could hardly move around the tables.

The only exit from the dimly lit bar was a stairway barely 1 yard wide. There were no fire alarms and no sprinklers in the nightspot in Inchon, a port city 30 miles west of Seoul.

With 55 people dead after Saturday night's fire, police sought arrest warrants Sunday for five people: four electricians they said ignored safety procedures and a teen-ager accused of inadvertently starting the fire while working on a new karaoke club in the basement of the three-story building. The five face charges of involuntary manslaughter.

Doctors feared the number of dead could rise, as some of the 74 people injured were in critical condition.

One survivor said workers in the Live II Hof told the teenage partygoers not to worry when flames and smoke climbed up the only exit way and began seeping through the door.

"It's nothing serious," 17-year-old Suh Min-jong said a worker told them.

"Then somebody shouted, 'Fire!' And people rushed for the exit, but there already was smoke and fire there, so they rushed towards the kitchen in a stampede," said Kim Soo-kyong, 18, who waited tables at the bar.

"They yelled for help and stumbled over each other. I felt feet on my back ... The lights were out. I felt a hot wind in my face and I passed out. When I woke up, I was in hospital," said Kim, who remained in the hospital Sunday, recovering from smoke inhalation and light burns on her hands and back.

The incident was the latest in a long series of fires and other disasters in South Korea that have been blamed on lax attention to safety.

President Kim Dae-jung ordered his government Sunday to step up safety inspections. He issued a similar order four months ago when 19 kindergartners and four adults were killed in a fire that gutted a seaside summer camp in western South Korea.

The fire began Saturday night, as revelers partied to earsplitting music and two teen-age workers cleaned the floor of a newly painted karaoke club in the basement.

The supervisor was gone, and they hurriedly mopped the paint-splattered floor with paint thinner.

According to police, one of them inadvertently broke an incandescent light with his mop handle, causing a spark and igniting the inferno.

Rec Report

Recreational Services' Office Located in Peters Recreation Complex

Wellness Resource Center

Been sitting on the couch too long, eating potato chips and need a boost in your life? Or maybe you are just bored with your same ol'-same o;' workout and need a new direction. You're in luck. The Wellness Resource Center, a free service for students and facility use card holders provided by Recreational Services, can help assess your fitness needs, design a personalized fitness program for you, familiarize you with machines and free-weights, and much more.

Located on the main floor of the Rec, the Wellness Resource Center is staffed by students in nutrition and exercise science and/or kinesiology. Currently, the Wellness Resource Center has three NSCA-Certified Personal Trainers on staff.

The Wellness Resource Center offers seven assessments of fitness and nutrition in addition to being a source of information for many health-related topics of interest. The first test is a body-fat test done by a seven-site skin-fold measurement. Next are blood pressure testing, endurance and strength testing, flexibility testing, a nutritional assessment and a submax VO2 that gives an estimate of an individual's maximum oxygen uptake.

In November, the Wellness Resource Center will be implementing a fitness assessment software program that covers all seven assessment testings in addition to wellness issues such as stress, depression and anxiety.

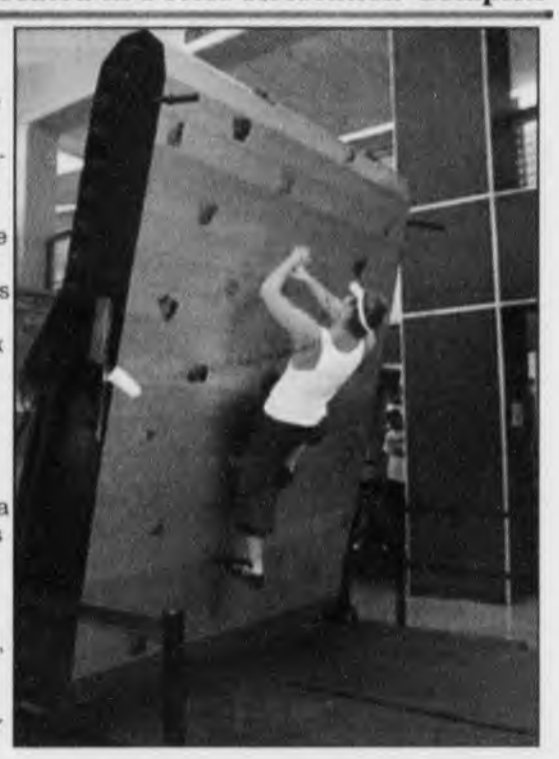
According to Lori Strack, Graduate Assistant-Fitness/Wellness, the computer program will give the individual an overall assessment of their well-being.

The Wellness Resource Center is a great opportunity for people with access to the Rec Complex.

"It's a great resource to them," Strack said. "If they start to get bored with their workout they can come in and we can brainstorm a new workout for them. It's never too late to get started. It does a lot for their quality of life and state of mind."

If your organization or group would like to learn more about the Wellness Resource Center with a presentation or you would like to make an appointment for a fitness assessment, call 532-0456 and set up an appointment today.

The Rock



Recreational Services welcomes the newest addition to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex: The Rock.

The Rock, a simulated two-person climbing wall, is an innovative, technological new way to rock climb. The Rock tilts, spins and rotates in a 105-degree radius to mimic real mountain climbing. Features of the climbing wall include the ability to program the climber's own personalized climb, download the "Climb of the Month", select one of 10 famous pre-programmed climbs such as El Capitan or Devil's Tower, compete against others who have climbed the Rock from around the world, and much more.

Because of interest on the Kansas State campus, Recreational Services decided to purchase the Rock, as opposed to a regular climbing wall.

"Other schools have put in climbing walls, and they are really popular for a while, but then the interest diminishes because when you are climbing 20 feet or higher you have to have training and supervision," Derek Walters, Associate Director of Indoor Facilities, said.

According to Walters, with the Rock you are never more than three or four feet off the ground, so safety should not be an issue.

The Rock provides more than just a fun atmosphere; it provides a great workout. Members of the U.S. Climbing Team use the climbing wall to train, but anyone can use the Rock, even those who have never climbed before.

"The Rock is more of a fitness piece of equipment because you can go for five, 10 or 15 minutes without stopping," Walters said. "With a climbing wall you climb up, rappel down and then you are done. With the Rock, you get a better workout."

So, if you haven't been to the Rec to check out the Rock, then what are you waiting for?

My Favorite Workout

Jessica Strohl, sophomore in Business Administration, enjoys coming to the Rec so she can stay in shape from her high school sports days.

"I've always been active and involved in sports, so I come to the Rec to stay active and keep up physically."

As a basketball player and track star in high school, Strohl enjoys the transports and other cardio machines in the cardio workout center.

"The Transports give me a full workout. Working out inside also keeps me out of the heat or cold, depending on the weather."

A typical workout for Strohl involves 20 minutes on the Transport machine or three miles on the bike. From there she heads upstairs to do six sets of 25 crunches. If time permits, she hits the weight machines, her favorite being the hip abductors and hip adductors. Finally, Strohl cools down with a jog on the indoor track.

Strohl's favorite part about coming to the Rec isn't only to stay in shape, though.

"I come with friends," she said. "We motivate each other and it's fun time to hang out with the girls."

Pool Action

It is 12 times tougher to walk through water then through air, which is one reason for the popularity and effectiveness of water aerobics. Another reason for its popularity is that water supports the joints, greatly reducing exercise-related stress. (Self, July 1997)

Sunday and Wednesday evening swim times throughout November, the 6-lane pool will be used for IM Inner Tube Water Polo. However, the 8-lane and the diving well will be open for recreational swimming.

Who's Who???

Laura Williamson, a Nutrition and Exercise Science major, is a fifth-year senior from Salina, Kan. Williamson works at the Rec as a fitness consultant and a building supervisor. An NSCA-Certified Personal Trainer, she spends her time in the Wellness Resource Center assessing individual's nutritional and fitness needs. Williamson decided she would like to work at the Rec as a result of her working out at the Rec.

"I wanted to work at the Rec because I loved coming here to work out and I really like the environment," Williamson said. "I wanted to be a fitness consultant because I want to help people change and start living a healthier life."

Williamson, who graduates in May, wants to continue promoting healthy living by working in corporate wellness.

Although the Rec has been good job experience for Williamson, working at the Rec has other advantages.

"My favorite thing about working here is the people that I work with," she said. "I have met so many great people and have many good friends."

Nicole Dautel, a native of Chapman, Kan., loves to exercise and live a healthy life. Her major, her current job at the Rec and her future career plans all are centered on her love of exercise.

A senior in kinesiology, Dautel is an exercise leader at the Rec. She teaches Interval, Toning and Step aerobics. Dautel also has her personal training certification.

Dautel has much work experience in exercise. She has worked at the Rec for two years as an exercise leader and taught aerobics at the Salina, Kan. YMCA and other fitness centers. This past summer, Dautel interned at the Cooper Institute in Dallas, Texas, where she researched exercise and taught a kickboxing class.

Working at the Rec has been a great experience for Dautel.

"I always hoped I could get on there. It's been an aspiration of mine," Dautel said. "I enjoy helping people and making them feel good after they workout. I also enjoy answering questions and promoting health."

As for future plans, Dautel has no definite plans, but she knows she wants to be involved with exercise, possibly a personal trainer in a fitness/wellness center.

Meanwhile, she continues to work at the Rec as an exercise leader and also serves on Rec Council as an off campus representative.

Fitness Facts

Most people will tell you that vigorous late-night exercise will disturb your sleep. According to research, this does not appear to be the case. Researchers tested a number of subjects undergoing strenuous exercise 30-minutes prior to bedtime. Their sleep was not affected by the previous activity. In other research, late-night exercise has even shown improvement in ability to fall asleep, sleep deeply and feeling better in the morning. The bottom line when deciding whether to exercise before bedtime should still rely on how your body reacts to the stress, regardless of what the research states.

Medicine & Science in Sport & Exercise, 1999.

Working It Out

The last day for the Fitness Walking sessions will be November 3. They will meet at 5:0 p.m. on the front steps to the Recreation Complex. Please dress appropriately, this session is held outside. This session will resume in the Spring semester when the weather starts to warm up again, look for the start up date to be posted on the aerobics bulletin board and Rec Check at 532-6000.

Nutrition Notes

It is a common misconception that athletes need more protein in their diet than the average Joe does. In fact, most active men and women do not need any more protein than a sedentary person does, even though they use their muscles more. Forms of protein alone will not add to a person's bulk or strength. The only way to build muscle is to place it under stress via physical activity. The only people who may require more protein in their diet are those engaging heavily in aerobic exercise. However, the typical American diet is already above average in its protein consumption, so this extra need is usually not much of a concern.

CHICAGO — Walter Payton, the Chicago Bears running back who became the NFL's all-time leading rusher and led the team to its only Super Bowl victory, died Monday. He was 45.

He suffered from a rare liver disease and had been waiting for a transplant. He was placed on the waiting list last winter.

"He's the best football player I've ever seen," said Mike Ditka, who coached Payton for six years, including the 1985 Super Bowl season.

The Topeka Capital-Journal reported in 1997 that Payton originally signed with K-State's football team before joining the Jackson State University squad.

Then-coach Vince Gibson used his final scholarship that year to recruit Payton, a gem from Mississippi who had racked up a bundle of yards in high school. However, Payton never arrived in Manhattan to play.

"When he was supposed to report, we called, and his mother said she'd put him on the bus and he's supposed to get there," former assistant coach R.C. Slocum told the Capital-Journal in 1997. "We found out when the bus went through Jackson, the Jackson State coaches met him. They went down to the bus station and got him of the bus."

Former Chicago Bears great and Hall of Fame running back Walter Payton announces at a press conference that he has a rare liver disease that will require him to have a liver transplant. Payton died Monday from the liver ailment.

Payton stayed at Jackson State to play college ball before moving on to the NFL ranks.

Payton rushed for 16,726 yards in his 13-year career, one of sport's most awesome records. Barry Sanders retired last July despite being just 1,458 yards shy of breaking Payton's mark.

"I want to set the record so high that the next person who tries for it, it's going to bust his heart," Payton once said.

Though his nickname was "Sweetness," Payton's running style was bruising. He vaulted over goal lines and

Searchers lose hope of finding crash survivors

BY PAT MILTON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEWPORT, R.I. — Coast Guard search crews gave up hope Monday of finding anyone alive from EgyptAir Flight 990 but found a large piece of wreckage and detected a signal believed to be from one of the plane's black boxes.

If Navy divers can retrieve the flight data recorder and cockpit voice recorder from the Atlantic Ocean floor off Nantucket, Mass., the devices could provide vital clues for investigators who as yet have no explanation for the crash.

"Nothing has been ruled in, nothing has been ruled out," President Clinton said in Oslo, Norway, where he was attending Middle East peace talks.

The Cairo-bound Boeing 767 was carrying 217 people when it plunged into the Atlantic from an altitude of 33,000 feet early Sunday, a half-hour after leaving New York's Kennedy Airport. The plane crashed without a distress call or any other indication of trouble from the pilots.

None of the debris found so far has any burn marks that might indicate a fire or explosion, Coast Guard Rear Adm. Richard M. Larrabee said at search headquarters in Newport.

Among the passengers were about 30 Egyptian military officers, mostly pilots who had been training in the United States, Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon said. The passengers also included 106 Americans, including 54 people bound for a two-week trip to Egypt and the Nile.

The Coast Guard, fearing bad weather today, stepped up its search for debris and human remains. Officials also admitted a new phase of the operation had begun.

"It is in everyone's best interest to no longer expect we will find survivors," Larrabee said.

Larrabee, speaking 35 hours after the crash, said the decision was based partly on the chilly water. The

The Kansas Legislature is accepting internship applications for students interested in learning about state politics.

Interns are responsible for helping legislators with research and constituent services. John Potter, chief of staff of the Speaker Pro Tem Office, said the internship is an opportunity for students to gain experience with politics.

"It's something the Legislature does to increase awareness," he said. "It's a wonderful opportunity for students. You have to have experience to get a job, but you have to have a job to gain experience."

"We expect them (legislators) to be citizens, but they really are on call 24 hours a day. Public service is a sacrifice on time, but it's a beautiful reward."

— John Potter, Chief of staff of the Speaker Pro Tem Office

The internship begins the week of Jan. 10, 2000, which is the first day of the legislative session, and runs through the final week of April. Interns can work with the Senate or House of Representatives and choose a Republican or Democratic legislator.

The internship is unpaid, with the exception of mileage for interns who live outside of Topeka. Potter said the 30-year program also builds communication skills and gives interns experience in a work setting.

"It really throws you into into a work environment to see if you can function," he said. "It's very rewarding."

The program also was selected to participate in a civil education project to gauge interns' opinions of the Legislature before and after the internship. Potter said the project will provide a different perspective to discover citizens' opinions of politicians.

He said the year 2000 session also will be interesting because of budget issues facing legislators.

"Kansas is going to have some interesting financial situations staring us in the face," Potter said.

Jeremy Anderson, chief of staff for the Office of the Senate Democratic Leader, said the Kansas Senate Democratic Caucus also is looking for interns. He said students who have good writing skills and an eagerness to learn about the political process are good intern candidates.

Anderson said the election year also will provide opportunities that are unavailable in other years.

"It's a great way to see the process in action. They are able to see it first hand," Anderson said. "If you are able to see it for a semester, you will probably have a different view of the way things work."

Brenden Wirth, senior in political science, said his internship with the Kansas Legislature provided him

Wefald asks for extension of university funding

BY SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State President Jon Wefald urged Gov. Bill Graves and the Kansas Legislature on Monday to recommit to the four-year funding package for institutions of higher education.

The 1999 legislative session passed Senate Bill 345, the four-year plan that would appropriate $70 million to Board of Regents universities, community colleges and technical colleges, Wefald said.

K-State would receive $20 million during the four-year span and would spend its share on raising faculty salaries, Wefald said.

Faculty salaries at K-State are far behind those of its five peer universities — Oregon State University, Iowa State University, Oklahoma State University, Colorado State University and North Carolina State University — Wefald said.

Faculty Senate President Marion Gray said all universities in Kansas are behind where they should be in salaries and suffer because of this.

WEFALD

"Institutions suffer when we can't keep and recruit the very best faculty," he said. "This is not a matter of faculty wanting extra money in their pockets. This is about working for the betterment of our university."

K-State has been behind its peer universities since the 1930s. The university has been trying unsuccessfully for decades to raise its salaries to a level comparable with other universities, Wefald said.

"We've been trying to do this for 50 years," he said. "It's a neverending project."

There are several reasons why Kansas lags behind in salaries. One reason being is the frame of mind prevalent in the state, Wefald said.

"Kansas is a very conservative state," he said. "It always has been and it always will be."

Gray said he sees two reasons for the salary gap.

"There are many institutions of higher learning in the state," he said. "There are more per capita here than many other states. The citizens of Kansas pay a fairly reasonable amount toward education."

The second reason is the Legislature undervalues the importance of competitive salaries, Gray said.

"The legislators of Kansas don't quite understand the need for dollars," he said. "They want to get by a little too cheaply."

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said money for appropriations will be tight in the next year.

"Money is going to be very tight this year," she said. "It's going to be a struggle to please everyone. We can't."

Gray said he is concerned the Legislators will overlook the universities' need for money since Graves has asked for a 1-percent across-the-board budget cut due to a decrease of state money.

"In the last four or five years, Kansas has had a good economy," Gray said. "For the first

IRS plans to include photos of missing children in forms

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Millions of photos of missing children will be included in 1999 tax documents and forms under a partnership between the Internal Revenue Service and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

"By utilizing space in tax products, the IRS has an opportunity to bring these pictures to the public in an effective and unprecedented way," IRS Commissioner Charles Rossotti said Monday.

The IRS will print pictures provided by the missing children's center on pages that had been left blank in the past and post them in its walk-in centers around the country, Rossotti said. Some 325 million total pictures will be included in this year's various 1040 form packets and instructions alone, officials said.

16-year-old Russian girl dies after being thrown off horse

WICHITA — A 16-year-old Russian girl has died from injuries she suffered when she was thrown from her horse during a day of sightseeing in southwest Kansas.

Olesja Mihajlova, a foreign-exchange student from Bobrov, Russia, staying with a family in Ingalls, was thrown from the horse Oct. 26 while riding near Dodge City.

She was airlifted to a Wichita hospital where she died Sunday morning after massive brain swelling.

She was one of four Russian students in Kansas for a six-week stay.

Bush sustains cuts, bruises after diving to avoid truck

AUSTIN, Texas — Texas Gov. George W. Bush sustained bruises to his leg and hip Monday when he dived to avoid a tractor-trailer truck that overturned near his jogging path.

"Governor Bush was treated at the scene and returned home and is traveling to New Hampshire this afternoon," said Linda Edwards, Bush's press secretary.

Bush, the Republican presidential front-runner, was jogging on the hike-and-bike trail around downtown Austin's Town Lake when the truck overturned on a street alongside the path.

"(He) dove to avoid being hit by the oncoming tractor-trailer truck," Edwards said.

Roscoe Hughey, a Texas Department of Public Safety agent who was trailing Bush on bicycle, was hospitalized after being hit by debris that flew from the vehicle, Edwards said.

Bush also was hit by some of the debris when the truck overturned, according to Austin Police Department spokeswoman Sally Muir. She said authorities weren't immediately certain what the material was.

"Governor Bush is in good condition and good spirits and hopes that Agent Hughey has not sustained any serious injuries," Edwards said.

Police were called about 12:06 p.m. CST.

"We're not clear what made it lose control, but the truck was out of control," Edwards said.

Bush left Austin later Monday for a campaign swing through New Hampshire, said campaign spokesman Scott McClellan. The governor was scheduled to have breakfast with voters in Dixville Notch, N.H. on Tuesday morning.

Bush campaign spokesman Mindy Tucker said there was no reason to suspect that the driver intended to hit the governor. She said the Texas state police were investigating. "There are a lot of details I don't have at this point," she said.

International Red Cross says volunteers continue to wane

GENEVA — With fewer than half the volunteers it had a decade ago, the International Red Cross is looking for new ways to boost recruitment.

The number of Red Cross members and volunteers worldwide has declined to 105 million from some 220 million in 1990, according to figures released Monday by the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies.

"There is a clear drop which we need to investigate," said Christoph Mueller, director of the federation's volunteering review project. "We count on our volunteers to deliver core services in the field, so we need to look for new ways to recruit and keep our volunteers."

The Red Cross blamed the drop on the growth of individualism, the fall of communism with its system of collective volunteering and a shift of attitude away from volunteering as a civic duty to a leisure activity.

Officials will examine ways of reversing the decline this week at the conference of the International Red Cross, which takes place once every four years.

Attending the meeting will be representatives from the 176 national Red Cross and Red Crescent societies, the neutral International Committee of the Red Cross and the 188 state signatories to the Geneva conventions on international humanitarian law.

Students collect 100 gallons of Legos to teach children about architecture

■ Elementary, architecture students to gather Nov. 11 for educational workshop.

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Legos and architecture are bringing a campus organization together with area parents and their children.

Elizabeth Smith, American Institute of Architecture Students treasurer, said AIAS sponsors a Lego Design Charette as a community involvement activity each year. This year, the charette will be at 7 p.m. Nov. 11, and it is open to the public.

"Elementary students from Manhattan are introduced to the basic design concepts," Smith, junior in architecture, said. "Then their creations are critiqued by architecture professors."

Russ Crader, AIAS member, said the group will be bringing 100 gallons of Legos to the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art to help teach children about buildings and the architecture that built them.

"In the past, the Lego charette has been a chance for architecture students to teach and play with elementary students about buildings " said Crader, fifth-year senior in architecture. "It's not necessarily about the buildings, but what they see on a day-to-day basis."

For example, a few years ago AIAS chose the theme of castles, Crader said. Students designed and built castles in order to understand the concept of the structure.

"By presenting the students with ideas of the building, they can then build accordingly," Crader said. "What we hope is they understand how the buildings affect daily lives."

"In the past, the Lego charette has been a chance for architecture students to teach and play with elementary students about buildings."

— Russ Crader, fifth-year senior in architecture

Smith said this year, the theme of the charette is "Big." She said she hopes having the event in conjunction with the Louis Kahn event, "The Sense of the City: Louis Kahn's Design for an Office Building in Kansas City, 1966-1973," at the art museum will encourage more community involvement. The Kahn exhibit will be open through Nov. 28.

"Builders at the charette will consist of elementary students, architecture students and faculty," Smith said. "We hope that there will be more community involvement than in the past because it is being held as part of the museum's other activities."

Crader said AIAS sponsors the event because it gives architecture students the opportunity to realize the effects architects have on the environment.

"There are really no benefits, but only intrinsic rewards knowing we might possibly have helped a young student understand what we do," Crader said.

"We are also giving them a better idea of architecture."

Crader said the number of schools that participate has increased throughout the five-year history of the event, and he said more college students than ever are volunteering their time.

"Members as a whole like this event because it is a lot of fun," Crader said. "Not only do we get to watch and help, but we get to do what most of us grew up doing — playing."

Crader said AISA will be going to elementary schools in the spring to do the same type of workshop. He said the theme will be different or a variation of "Big."

Professors from K-State, 2 other universities combine to offer online course

BY CHRISTINA HOGGATT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When distinguished professor of plant pathology Jan Leach begins her lecture in Molecular Plant-Microbe Interactions, students in three states begin to listen.

With the use of Internet 2, the highly advanced graduate-level course is jointly taught by three professors at three universities at the same time.

This is the first time in the United States that three experts have come together to teach a completely interactive class using Internet 2. Marty Dickman, an expert in fungal plant-microbe interactions and professor at University of Nebraska in Lincoln; Tom Wolpert, an expert in fungal plant toxins and professor at Oregon State University; and Leach, an expert in the molecular, physiology and bacterial plant-microbe interactions at K-State, have begun the first journey with the new technology.

Students in the class are able to interact with the professors and one another in real time by using several televisions. The real-time flow of information is possible through the use of an increased bandwidth, which allows more information to travel faster and longer distances.

"This class is essential to the future of education and to the survival of the university to keep ahead of the technology," Leach said. "It is a breakthrough because we are able to have a three-way, free-flowing discussion without breaks or pauses."

The class also gives students the opportunity to broaden their horizons by having the opinions of three experts in the field, Leach said. She said it is highly advantageous for students to interact with one another and to have an in-depth look at three different areas in the field as well as three different opinions.

"One major advantage to this course format is that it's team-taught, and each of the instructors have distinct scientific expertise," Wolpert said. "This class explores many issues that are on the cutting edge of science, and with the individual skills of each professor we provide a higher quality course."

Despite the advantages of Internet 2 in the classroom, students and professors are having to adapt to the new format.

"It was hard to get used to talking to a TV at first, but I have began to enjoy the interaction," said Kimberly Webb, graduate student in plant pathology. "This class offers amazing debates and different viewpoints on all topics. I wouldn't be able to get this type of interaction with so many different students and professors in a regular classroom."

Although most students seem to be adapting well to the changes of an electronic classroom, a few said they still are shy.

"I don't like having to watch myself on the TV and the media interaction involved," said Martin Steinau, graduate student in plant pathology. "But the class is really interesting, and the discussions with three different experts are a benefit."

Leach said everybody was a little nervous and uncomfortable with the new technology when the class first started, but now most people have adjusted quite well and are used to talking to TV screens.

"Though it was somewhat strange to talk back to a TV screen, I think we have all adapted pretty well," Wolpert said. "But one of the nice aspects of technology is that this class is almost identical to a normal classroom with instant access of student to teacher and teacher to student."

With the use of the new technology comes regulation, technology glitches and funding issues.

"There is a graduated scale for the cost of the technology in the classroom," said Melvin Chastain, associate professor and director of the Kansas Regents Communication Center. "The technology is transparent to the educational course experience, and we are concerned about the class and how the technology can benefit from that.

"It's not a question of how much to spend, but of if the technology is benefiting the classroom, which it is."

The equipment for Internet 2 is costly, and the three universities always are looking for new ways to fund this essential aspect of education, Leach said. Even though the technology still has some glitches, they are becoming less and less frequent, she said.

"It is really frustrating when you are in the middle of a lecture and the TV screen just goes blank and then shoots right back on like nothing happened," she said. "But the problems were at the beginning, and now the technical part of presenting this course is almost invisible."

Internet 2 is growing quickly, and a huge amount of traffic information is already loading the system, but there is no regulation at this time, Leach said. The FCC recently has started an Internet 2 committee, and the beginnings of regulation for the future are in full swing.

The opportunities Internet 2 is providing for the class show the possibilities for its future use.

"Internet 2 is essential for the way of teaching and doing research in the future," Leach said. "It also gives students opportunities to have more advanced classes and also take classes that may not be offered at K-State."

Aggieville bars should monitor size of crowds

Fifty-five people died when an overcrowded South Korean bar caught fire last weekend. While South Korea might sound like a world away, the bar sounds like any weekend night in an Aggieville bar.

The South Korean bar was so overcrowded that survivors reported waitresses hardly could move around the tables. Aggieville bars often are similarly filled to capacity. Some are so crowded that waitresses and patrons move. Just this weekend at one Aggieville bar, a glass window burst when too many people crowded onto the dance floor.

Although the bouncers keep counts of patrons, invariably more people get into the bar than probably should. Some bars have two doors, making it difficult for bouncers to keep an accurate head count.

Some bars have the capacity to hold tons of people. However, when everyone congregates on the dance floor, it creates an atmosphere that could be hazardous.

This isn't to say that the bars in Aggieville don't do the best they can to keep customers safe. However, fire safety is something of which they should be aware. Staff should be trained to help patrons escape. Every bar should try to maintain a safe number of patrons at any one time. In short, every precaution should be taken to ensure that what happened in South Korea doesn't happen in Manhattan.

I think it's really sad that the independents are jealous of the greeks just because we have better grades, better cars and better-looking girlfriends than they do.

I would like to thank whoever threw a well-packed fistful of dog poop at my head during the game. With such aim and throwing ability, you should have been on the field. Baylor really needed you.

Yes. I think they should change the Fourum name to "greek bashing from independents who know they weren't good enough to get into a greek house."

I'd like to thank all the people that made this the lowest-attended game of the season. Maybe next week or next Homecoming you could put down your little papier-mâché dolls and your float and actually show up.

Whoever picked the shows for Cinemax is my hero.

If living in the residence hall costs the same as living in a sorority or fraternity, does that mean that people in the residence halls also buy their friends?

Since we're so hard up for money that we have to choose Coke or Pepsi, why don't we just license the Nike checkmark to replace Willie?

This is to all the independents. I am greek. I am better than you and better-looking than you. I do more for this university. I will make more of this university. I am better than everyone else, because I am greek and you are idiots.

This is to all you narrow-minded, whiny independents. Get a life and shut up, because no one cares.

The water fountains at the Rec are disgusting. No wonder everyone on this campus is getting sick.

If I remember correctly, my dad paid $30,000 for my Explorer, not $18,000. So, if you're going to make ignorant comments, why don't you at least get the facts straight?

Battling the Homecoming BLUES

VIEWPOINT

JON KURCHE

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

There are a number of people out there happy to see last Friday come and go.

You see, for many, last week was a week of pure, unadulterated hell. A combination of the two extremes college students face — last week was both finals week and spring break, both unrestricted fun and excitement and burdensome labor, both midterms and Homecoming.

Forgive me for dredging up that word — Homecoming. Forgive me, because that collective sigh of relief breathed by the campus last week is matched only by the collective groan it elicits. Homecoming has a way of raising the hackles on much of campus.

Divide K-State into three parts.

Find the people who are ambivalent toward Homecoming. That's one group — the group that gets tired of hearing about it, tired of reading about it and simply doesn't care. Find the people who love Homecoming — that's another group — they defend it, participate in it and foam at the mouth to the accusation that perhaps Homecoming isn't all it's cracked up to be. Then there's the people who hate Homecoming with a passion — the ones who revile it for the attention it gets and the time it takes up.

The split is no different than any other issue, really. Our current practice of Homecoming is divisive. With divisive issues there is, erm ... division — the more relevant the issue is, the more difficult it is to ignore. Homecoming is darn difficult to ignore once it comes around. That, in and of itself, makes it a relevant issue.

Did you follow that?

Ahem.

Instead of helping make Homecoming a worthwhile event that everyone can enjoy, many declare it exclusionary, then proceed to reaffirm that feeling by bagging on its participants. In our divisive regard for the event we have marginalized parties and decided that the greek community is full of zealots.

I am an advocate of Homecoming with qualification — which means I think it has a great deal of untapped potential — but then I am also Greek, so there is a touch of bias. After all, I paid good money for my friends, and I should be protecting that investment, right? I by all means should don the same color jacket as everyone I know, get drunk enough to blow Project Wellness off the map, and try to shack as many drunk sorority women as possible.

Hmm. ...

That's probably not the purpose of Homecoming .

I think Homecoming is a terrific opportunity to reach out to alumni, to rejuvenate their interest in K-State and to give ourselves an idea of the heritage we carry by attending school here.

I think Homecoming is a terrific opportunity to reach out to members of our Manhattan community and to show them our appreciation for sharing their community.

I think Homecoming is a terrific opportunity to reach out to ourselves and celebrate K-State's achievements.

The effect of such an event should bring the constituency of K-State together — to add a touch of pride, perhaps improve our relationships with one another. Students should feel good about being here, they should feel as though they belong to something. This idyllic situation is not the current picture of Homecoming .

We simply do not consider cooperating enough to make Homecoming worthwhile. At the end of the spring semester, Homecoming was set to be this week — the week of the Colorado game apparent schedule conflicts forced a decision following last semester to move Homecoming week to the week of the Baylor game.

Such short notice made it nearly impossible to garner an effective turnout of alumni — there's no excuse for those empty seats at KSU stadium this weekend against Baylor. The Homecoming game should be absolutely packed with alumni.

The Homecoming competitions are such that none of the above objectives are met. Notice that the only activities that really embrace the community are the parade and paint it purple, where more than 3,000 hours of community service were racked up. Both events are fun and worthwhile independently of competition. The rest of the events are more cumbersome, less useful and less interesting. Early losses in these competitions encourage Homecoming participants to withdraw since it becomes impossible for them to win overall.

Why?

We have been blindly dedicated to a few Homecoming traditions for years. Now, since the bodybuilding competition was canceled because of liability, we have the opportunity to look at all of Homecoming critically. We have the chance to change Homecoming into something less centered on competition and more centered on alumni. Invite alumni guest speakers, have tours of alumni roving all week. Make the pep rally less about finding out who won the Homecoming competition and more about spirit. Get band members to wear their uniforms on a specific day during the week. Have the K-State Singers performing in the K-State Student Union. Give Willie the Wildcat free reign of the campus and the permission to burst into a few approved classrooms to lead the students in the fight song.

If Homecoming is going to be a campus-wide event, it must be centered on campus.

Period.

That is the only way to get every student involved. In order to do that, there must be cooperation from the faculty and administration. There must be support from K-State.

A few faculty members, for instance, specifically schedule tests on Homecoming week to assert a tenuous amount of control and influence over their students and — vicariously — the university. It's as if there is a desire to prove to Homecoming participants that their minds only should be on academics. Homecoming week fell on a critical week of pre-enrollment, and statistically, this time of the year is the most dense testing period of all. So, torn between responsibilities to myself and my classes and the university and my peers, there is a large part of me that is considering leaving school and not returning to higher education for some time. After all, Homecoming should be about cooperation and unity, and instead it embodies schism. The problem is not with the Alumni Association — the group that sponsors Homecoming — its Homecoming committee budget is practically too small to cover Ambassador elections, let alone bring the entire university together.

Should we keep Homecoming?

Although getting rid of the event entirely is a bit premature, we should keep it as long as we can muster enough interest out of K-State.

It wouldn't be the first time we lost Homecoming, after all.

If we can't get our act together, perhaps we don't deserve it.

Infringements upon 8th Amendment should be extended to torture, medical testing

VIEWPOINT

DANEDRI THOMPSON

The Eighth Amendment assures Americans who commit crimes — no matter how heinous their crimes might be — they will not suffer cruel or unusual punishment at the hands of our justice system.

At least, that's what the Eighth Amendment is supposed to ensure. Unfortunately, it doesn't exactly, because we send criminals to their deaths when we use capital punishment. It is cruel and unusual punishment and serves no purpose.

What we should use instead is cruel and unusual punishment with a purpose. We should torture criminals and use them for medical tests. Yeah, that sounds a little sick, but it makes a whole lot more sense than sticking someone in a cell for 40 years to wait for an execution date.

Case in point: the Pamela Butler kidnapping and murder.

Ten-year-old Pamela Butler made Kansas City headlines when she was abducted Oct. 12. Her alleged abductor cased the area first according to reports from surrounding businesses and neighbors who noticed a suspicious man in a white truck.

At about 5:40 p.m., someone nabbed Pamela as she roller skated through her neighborhood with her older sister, Penny, who saw the person's face and the truck the abductor was driving. After hearing both Penny and Pamela scream, a neighbor chased down the truck and got a license plate number.

Two days later, police cornered Keith Nelson the man who allegedly took Pamela. Pamela was nowhere to be found. Police traced him to the truck, found Pamela's hair in it and learned from one of Nelson's co-workers that earlier in the week Nelson said he would like to kidnap a girl.

As police searched for him, Nelson hurt his knee. So, Nelson was treated to a hospital stay while the search for Pamela continued.

If the police were so sure that Nelson had a good idea where she could be found, they would have been better served to beat him in the kneecap until he relented the necessary information than wheeling him to surgery.

Pamela's body was found shortly after Nelson left surgery. Her clothes were found a little later.

If found guilty, Nelson could get the death penalty. Obviously, anyone who would commit such a crime must have a death wish.

Why else would any person take Pamela in broad daylight in full view of everyone in the neighborhood? Better yet, why would an abductor tell someone about plans to kidnap a girl before it happened? No one would likely do that, unless they have a death wish, something that would likely come true in the United States.

That's like rewarding that person for a heinous crime. When you're a total nut job with a death wish, the threat of capital punishment isn't much of a deterrent.

If found guilty, punishment instead should benefit society.

Criminals could benefit the rest of us by allowing science the use of their bodies. Although no one life could replace the loss of a victim's life, a convict could save someone by donating a kidney to one of the 40,000 people waiting for one. That would in part pay the debt they owe to society and do some good.

If capital punishment is cruel and unusual punishment, as I believe it is, allowing torture for information and the use of criminals for medical tests should be allowed, too. At least both of those things would do some good.

Students should take advantage of chance to test bone marrow

Editor,

Each year, thousands of people die from diseases such as leukemia, aplastic anemia and other blood-related diseases that can be cured only with a bone marrow transplant from a donor. More than 60 percent of patients requiring bone marrow do not have a matching family member who can donate the needed marrow. For this reason, a bone-marrow registry has been created, allowing patients to find potential donors to save their lives. You have the opportunity to become part of the Heart of America Bone Marrow Donor Registry thanks to the family of Mike Meier. Meier was a K-State graduate who died in 1992 in need of a bone marrow transplant. In an effort to help the hundreds of other patients like Mike, his family set up a memorial fund to support a bone marrow donor drive at K-State.

On , Nov. 10, the K-State Alumni Association will be sponsoring the Mike Meier Memorial Bone Marrow Donor Drive at the K-State Student Union from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m. in the Union Little Theatre.

To enter the program, a donor must be between the ages of 18 and 60. A donor must be in good health and not have a history of hepatitis, cancer, heart disease, AIDS or other chronic illnesses. The donor must not take drugs by injection unless prescribed by a physician. The donor will view a short video prior to the blood test and also have the opportunity to get any questions they might have answered. After viewing the video, a small vial of blood will be taken from the donor's arm. This blood test is free, and there are no costs to the prospective donors. Test results then are sent to the National Marrow Donor Program, where the donor becomes part of the national registry.

Maybe you'll have the chance to save a life. Just increasing the pool of potential donors increases the odds of survival for people with many life-threatening diseases. Please be a part of the Mike Meier Memorial Bone Marrow Donor Drive. Thank you.

Students construct regents' Web site

BY RHONDA NIDA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students from the Orion Project have made the connection between the Kansas Board of Regents and Kansas citizens.

In May, Orion, an organization of student Web masters, began work on the regents' Web site. Wesley Blue, senior in management information science, has worked on the Web site since its beginning. He said there was a need to work on the regents' Web site because it was geared only toward the members of the board, and it lacked public access of information. He said he started working on the site by accident after meeting a contact for the board. Blue did a case study and suggested the Orion Project work on the Web site. From there, he said, the ball was rolling.

"That's how most things happen," Blue said. "They are happy accidents. I have worked on seven sites in some sort of direct fashion. The Board of Regents site is my baby. That's the one I helped with from ground up."

Blue said gathering information for a Web site takes a lot of communication among all people involved. He also said the most enjoyable part of working on Orion and the Web site was working with fellow team members.

"We all have a tangible endpoint to our arguments," Blue said. "It's nice to have a tangible thing to do. It's not some fictitious thing you do and turn in for a grade and means absolutely nothing to you. As far as what I have gotten out of it, there are so many things, like general communications skills from doing presentations and one-to-one interactions with different people, troubleshooting, and of course, the actual technical skills. I had thought about design issues but never really got involved with them. Now I have gained that experience."

Rita Richardson, senior in mass communications and public relations, said she spent 10-15 hours during the summer on the Web site. She said Orion Project members all came up with basic ideas then took photographs of Kansas-oriented themes. Since Kansas is known for its skies, sunsets and wheat, she said they tried to incorporate those items into the banners and backgrounds.

REGENTS

"The teamwork here is great," she said. "If you don't know how to do something, there's no such thing as a stupid question. The Web is still a relatively new field, and here we're out to do it right the first time. If you don't know how to do something, ask someone, and if they don't know, they help you figure it out."

Blue said board members and associates, such as K-State President Jon Wefald, seemed pleased with the new site after the Orion members' presentation.

"I had a lot of compliments after the presentation from individuals, from other universities and President Wefald," he said. "He seemed pleased, and the Board members seemed pleased."

Some challenges were posed during work on the Web site.

Richardson said one of the biggest obstacles was that there are not many Web classes available, and students need to get their own experience by jumping in and going to work.

"From that standpoint, everything is a challenge," she said. "You see a lot of things out on the Web — some good, some bad — and you may say, 'Wow, how do I do that?' But there's not really a book, so you just have to jump in and do it. A lot of the things graphically are challenging. It's also a challenge to make a page that looks good and loads fast. But that's also good experience, because you learn to get around it."

Tom Gould, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications and Orion director, said improvements to the site are continuous, and Orion's goal was to make the site usable to all Kansas citizens.

"The thing about the Web site that was so challenging was that you can't use the business organization plan to find how to set the site up," Gould said. "That's what makes it so interesting. I think it is unique that for the first time, people in the state of Kansas now can find out what courses their kids need to take to get into the university, and they can do it online. And they can get connections to every single Kansas university in one place. They can contact all the regents by e-mail. They can ask for more information."

Gould also said Orion will be doing more Web site projects in the spring. Students working on the sites range from engineering to journalism to business majors.

"We are going to be doing some historical sites this spring for places that are just appearing in Kansas," he said. "If we are lucky, we will get some grants for that. The real idea is that Orion is going to try to get a grant next year for the following reasons. We believe that the next great phase of the Web is going to be not just searching the Web for information, but a very real uptake of just average people setting up Web sites. You think you've seen an explosion now of pages, you ain't seen nothing yet."

Jury to determine value of smoking's consequences

BY TRACY FIELDS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — A jury that already has decided cigarette smoking causes cancer and other diseases now must put a price tag on the pain and suffering of half a million sick Florida smokers.

Opening statements in the damages phase of the landmark trial got under way this morning after hours of closed-door meetings between the attorneys and the trial judge.

An industry attorney and analysts have predicted that a lump-sum verdict could approach $300 billion, which would cripple the embattled industry.

"It's always easy to assume that tobacco is down," said Martin Feldman, a tobacco analyst with Salomon Smith Barney in New York. "Very often it bounces back with either a successful appeal or with a strategy that hadn't been considered previously."

An estimated 500,000 sick Florida smokers and their relatives won the first phase of the first class-action lawsuit by smokers to reach trial when jurors found that the industry had engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct regarding its product.

In September, Big Tobacco believed it had won a significant victory when the 3rd District Court of Appeal ruled damage claims must be considered one smoker at a time, removing the threat of a single multibillion-dollar verdict.

The judges reversed themselves Oct. 20 and put the decision on the lump-sum award back in jurors' hands.

The industry still might be able to use a tactic that has worked before: blame the smokers for their smoking-related illnesses.

DEFENSIVE BOREDOM

Defensive standout Simoneau says offensive domination complicates attempt to stay focused

For the first time in recent memory, K-State senior linebacker Mark Simoneau actually got bored during a football game.

That was how he described the Wildcats' 48-7 Homecoming win against Baylor. Simoneau's boredom stems from the fact that the K-State offense dominated the time of possession 38:49 to 21:11, nearly five minutes longer than the K-State offense usually has the football.

When the defense made it onto the field, it smothered a Baylor offense that had been averaging 448 yards per game. For the contest, the Bears tallied 119 yards total offense on 49 offensive plays.

"Our defense just came out and we stuck it to them," junior defensive end Monty Beisel said. "We played a real good ball game as a team."

The K-State pass defense, the best in the country in opponent's pass efficiency entering the game, held the Bears to 17 yards passing, while the Baylor quarterbacks completed three of 16 pass attempts.

"We felt we could match up with their receivers," defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said. "We had some good rushes and some good pressures and that was good for us."

Simoneau and junior defensive end Chris Johnson each sacked Baylor starting quarterback Jermaine Alfred, while freshman defensive end Melvin Williams and sophomore strong safety Milton Proctor sacked backup Odell James once each.

Bennett said pressure on the quarterbacks is one of the key elements that is overlooked when talking about a team's pass defense.

"It's not just the secondary, it's the whole team," Bennett said. "It's our linebackers and our defensive line too. When you pass the ball, you can force a bad throw, you can make the quarterback hold the ball — it's just a team thing."

If there was a disappointing aspect of the Wildcats' defensive performance, it was that the Bears became the first team in 1999 to score a touchdown against K-State in the second half when running back Darrell Bush scored on a 4-yard run in the fourth quarter.

Even though Texas had kicked a field goal against K-State in the second half of their contest earlier in the season, not giving up a touchdown in the second half had been something the defense took pride in.

"It meant a heck of a lot to me — I didn't want them to score," Bennett said. "I'm not going to slit my wrists over it, but I'll tell you this — I was disappointed in it."

Beisel's response to the score was different.

"It wasn't disappointing — it's disappointing when anyone scores," he said. "We played good defense today, but that's just one of those things that happens. You're going to break down once in a while, and somebody's going to produce."

K-State now enters the final three games of the regular season in much the same fashion as last year — undefeated, seemingly outside the Bowl Championship Series picture and looking to gain the respect of the national media.

Last season, the Wildcats' defense played its worst during the last four games of the year, surrendering 30 points to Nebraska, 25 to Missouri, 36 to Texas A&M and 37 to Purdue.

Taking into account what happened last season, the 1999 K-State football team vows it won't let the same thing happen two years in a row.

"We realize we still have a long ways to go yet," Beisel said. "We've got three games left to go in the regular season, and I think we're going to step it up."

K-State falls to No. 6 after defeat of Baylor

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In week two of the Bowl Championship Series, the K-State Wildcats fell to No. 6, while the Florida Gators moved up to take the No. 4 spot, just ahead of Tennessee.

With K-State's 48-7 win over the Baylor Bears (1-7, 0-5), the worst team in the Big 12 Conference, the Cats' strength of schedule fell from 43rd to 69th. No. 3 Virginia Tech also suffered in the schedule-strength category, falling from 42nd to 58th.

As the BCS already has said, if No. 1 Florida State and No. 2 Penn State win out this season, they will play for the national championship at the Nokia Sugar Bowl in New Orleans, La.

Florida State still has a matchup with the Gators looming, while Penn State still has to face Michigan and Michigan State this season. Unfortunately for the Cats, when the Gators and Seminoles meet, both of their schedule strengths will rise, regardless of the game's outcome.

K-State, on the other hand, should experience another jump in the strength of schedule after upcoming games against Colorado and Nebraska.

Fans should wait before predicting win over Nebraska

VIEWPOINT

RICH SMITH

A few loosely connected thoughts inspired by a weekend of sitting on the couch and watching football ...

■ Let's slow down a bit before we start choosing which Aggieville bar the goalposts from Lincoln's Memorial Stadium will look best atop come Nov. 13.

OK, so the Huskers do look eminently beatable after nearly laying an egg for the Chickenhawks on Saturday. Remember one thing, though — Nebraska's struggles the past two weekends both have been on the road, while K-State must venture into Lincoln to retrieve its prize. As K-State has proven this year, even good squads will have their struggles on the road. At home, the Huskers have had few such problems, still waxing foes by 28 points a pop like times haven't changed.

Is K-State capable of beating Nebraska in Lincoln? Absolutely. But however good or bad the Huskers look, it will take a mean game for the Cats to come away victorious, count on that.

■ Speaking of mean games, maybe we should just hold off the Cornhusker Countdown until the actual week of the Nebraska game. Something tells me this weekend's matchup against Colorado might not be quite the walk it looks like on paper. The Buffs really put a number on a good Oklahoma team in its not-as-close-as-it-sounds 38-24 victory Saturday in Boulder, Colo.

Mike Moschetti is exactly the sort of multi-threat quarterback K-State has struggled to stop previously against Iowa State and Oklahoma State, and Moschetti barely batted an eye at Oklahoma's K-State-derived defense this weekend, throwing for 382 yards and four scores.

Defensively, the Buffs have a couple of corners who could make K-State pay if they struggle trying to get their passing offense untracked. K-State barely escaped Boulder alive last season, and if a schizophrenic Colorado team brings its "A"-game this weekend, it could be tough for the Wildcats to get rid of. Upset potential? Probably not at KSU Stadium, but it could be a much tougher game than advertised.

■ Given that the Cats can run the table, though, the early line on national title shows some hope for K-State. Of the five teams in front of the Cats in the ESPN/USA Today Coaches Poll, Florida and Florida State still play each other, so one will have to drop out.

Virginia Tech has potential upset specials in a trip to West Virginia and home tests vs. Miami and Boston College yet to come. Penn State still must sweep Minnesota and the two Michigan schools to win the parity-filled Big Ten. With only Notre Dame and Arkansas lingering as real threats, Tennessee should run the table, but their existing one loss might allow K-State to vault over it once all the math is done in the BCS.

What does all this mean? It means K-State is in more or less the same position they were last year, give or take a Sagarin point. They still need other teams to lose and lose quickly for a shot at the big dance, but it happened last year despite odds to the contrary.

■ My Heisman vote (as if you cared): Joe Hamilton, Georgia Tech. Just ask , would Tech even be in smelling distance of the top 10 right now with a lesser man as their quarterback? Of course not.

This is also something of a sentimental pick — partially because he reminds me of Michael Bishop leading last year's K-State team into the top 10, and partially because I still prefer my sports heroes felony-free.

Women's tennis team concludes season at home

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The tennis squad rounded out the fall regular season this weekend as the women were host of the Wildcat Doubles Invitational at Cottonwood Racquet Club in Manhattan.

Heading into the tournament, head coach Steve Bietau said there are many positives in having a doubles tournament in the fall.

"It will definitely help prepare our team for regionals," Bietau said. "We can spend a significant amount of time on doubles, which will help us continue to play better."

The women responded quite well.

The doubles tandem of sophomore Alena Jecminkova and junior Anna Pampoulova, coming off a consolation-round doubles title two weeks ago at the Indiana Hoosier Classic in Bloomington, Ind., finished the invitational with a 4-2 record in flight one.

The team of sophomore Vesselina Jeliaskova and freshman Petra Sedlmajerova notched a 3-2 record in flight two.

Bietau said even though all the teams played inconsistently, there were definite positives from the invitational.

"We did some good things, and then the team played poorly at times," he said. "However, at times they played very well — better than they have before."

Bietau said he hopes that the Wildcat Doubles Invitational will benefit the team heading into postseason play.

"We'll see at regionals," he said. "If they can clean up some of the mistakes, they're making then I would say it was a successful tournament."

"We got the work in that we wanted to get in, and we focused on our specific area of concern."

Junior Eva Novotna' and sophomore Katy Chuda had a difficult tournament this weekend, posting a disappointing 0-5 record before Chuda dropped out of the competition due to an ankle injury.

Chuda will have surgery on her ankle this week, an injury that had been plaguing her all fall.

When asked if Chuda's injury will keep her out the entire year, Bietau said, "Hopefully not. We're optimistic that she'll be able to go in the spring."

K-State battled doubles squads from Iowa State, Oklahoma State, and Creighton in the invitational. The four-team tournament featured 13 total doubles squads, which were broken down into two flights. Each doubles team played every squad in its particular flight.

Heading into regionals, Bietau knows what it will take for the team to succeed.

"More consistent play," Bietau said. "They have to know where to hit the ball and when to hit it there, and they need to do a better job of positioning themselves on the court."

Bietau said the team has made mental strides over the course of the season, which will benefit the team in the postseason.

"This fall the players have matured in a lot of ways," Bietau said.

The Wildcats are now using that maturity in preparation for the ITA Regional Tournament Nov. 4-7 in Salt Lake City, Utah.

Coaches say Big 12 parity keeping division races tight

BY DOUG ALDEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The logjam in the Big 12 standings isn't much of a surprise to conference coaches.

Just look at what happened last weekend: Iowa State scored 41 points against Big 12 South leader Texas, only to lose on a last-second field goal. Kansas shut out Nebraska in the first half and nearly snapped a 30-game losing streak to the Cornhuskers. Lowly Baylor, which has yet to win a league game, scored the first touchdown K-State has allowed in the second half this season.

All three lost but showed that things are more even than ever in the Big 12, coaches said Monday during the league's weekly conference call.

"People don't want to hear the 'p' word — parity — but it's here. It's right on top of us," Texas coach Mack Brown said. "We used to talk about having a great season and looking down the road. Now you'd better play each game like it's the season. You'd better throw out everything before that game, because you never know who's going to show up the day you get there."

K-State (8-0 overall, 5-0 Big 12) is the last of the unbeaten teams in the league, but on Nov. 13, K-State plays at Nebraska (7-1, 4-1), a team that has stumbled a bit lately but is still in position to represent the division in the league championship game Dec. 4 in San Antonio.

How to have a THRIFTY DATE in MANHATTAN

FILE PHOTO BY KAREN MIKOLS/COLLEGIAN

Students enjoy bowling in the K-State Student Union earlier this semester. Bowling costs $1.75 per game for students Friday and Saturday nights with 75-cent shoe rental, providing an option for students in search of low-priced date ideas.

■ K-State students offer ideas, tips for inexpensive local dates.

BY DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Melvin Watson, senior in hotel and restaurant management, wants to romance a date by treating her to a night on the town, he plans to spend more than $10. In fact, if he only has $10, he will not ask someone for a date.

"If I only had $10, I'd take me to get something to eat," he said. "I don't think I could take someone out for under 10 bucks."

Val Daniels, author of 10 Harlequin romance novels, including "Making Mr. Right," said the most romantic dates, however, aren't necessarily the most expensive ones.

"The best dates are the ones where you get to know each other," she said. "Some of the more expensive ones, you can't do that. If you go to a movie, you can't talk, but if you go to Denny's for coffee, you can talk all night."

Travis Murray, junior in music education, said he has managed to take a girl out for less than $10 in the past. He said he cuts dating costs by treating dates to a night in rather than a night out.

Murray said he has an almost foolproof plan to impress without shelling out the big bucks.

"If I like them, I make dinner for them," he said. "It always works."

Daniels said she isn't surprised that a homemade dinner works for the monetarily impaired, because when you get the feeling someone is trying to impress you, it's romantic.

"Someone spending money on you can be impressive, but someone spending a lot of effort on you is even more impressive," she said.

Murray said there is a difference, however, between someone you're taking out for the first time and someone you've been dating for an extended period. You should plan to spend more on a first date, he said, but after that, it isn't as important to spend so much.

"If you know she likes you," he said, "you don't have to try to impress a girl."

Jami Tegethoff, freshman in open-option, said she wouldn't recommend only spending $10 on a first date. She said she once went on a first date with someone who spent less than $10 on the entire evening, and she didn't go out with him ever again.

However, Tegethoff said, this example doesn't mean she would refuse to see someone solely because he spent no more than a bill graced by Alexander Hamilton on a night of her company.

"If the first date was something boring, then probably not, but if it was something fun, then I am not that hard to please, I guess," she said.

Daniels said getting to know whether someone is easy to please is the whole point of dating. She said being cheap can have its rewards in helping you figure out what your date values.

"Basically, if they're after just an expensive date, you probably don't want to take them on a second date anyway," she said.

Information about investment potential readily available, even on K-State campus

If judging an investment's potential requires an understanding of the company in which you wish to invest, both qualitatively (the perception of the business as a whole) and quantitatively (evaluation of the finances of the business), then a reliable source for information is a requirement. Fortunately, information on just about every part of a given company is readily available — often free of cost — even at K-State.

The best source for information on a company is its filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the government arm that oversees stock markets, broker/dealers and corporations whose shares are traded publicly. The SEC's mission is "to be the investor's advocate," to work to protect the investor's interests by ensuring that companies with publicly traded shares of stock are diligent in reporting relevant information about their businesses.

With a few exceptions for small or specially organized companies, all publicly traded companies are required to file quarterly and annual reports with the SEC, which provide information on the company's business, market risks, finances from balance sheets and profit-and-loss statements, and a discussion from the management of the company that usually addresses trends, recent events and sometimes management's future expectations for the businesses.

Annual reports are called 10-K reports, and quarterly reports are called 10-Q reports. Investors can use the information in these reports to get a good idea of the company's financial strength and future potential.

Both 10-K and 10-Q reports can be requested free of charge from a company, provided you have the company's investor-relations contact information. Sometimes the company will send a copy of the 10-K annual report as an attachment to its annual report to shareholders.

If this is the case, you must be sure not to be too impressed by the often-happier picture presented in the annual report than might be given in the required 10-K filing. Alternately, both types of reports as well as several others are available on the Internet free of charge at www.sec.gov by using the SEC's Edgar service.

To use Edgar, all you need to know is the name of the company that interests you, and the program will find all relevant filings from the company. In some cases, you might need to try a few variations of the company name, or different combinations of words if the name is long, to get a correct match.

Less-detailed information on companies also is available in Hale Library, as well as in most public libraries, through the use of Standard & Poor's tearsheets and Moody's investment review books.

Standard & Poor and Moody's are independent investment-ratings services that follow financial information. Standard & Poor's tearsheets generally are one-page information sheets about a company that provides condensed information. Tearsheets often discuss recent events at the company, the company's businesses, Standard & Poor's future expectations for the company, as well as give a history of the company's earnings and the company's balance sheet that goes back more than several years.

This information over a period of time is important, because it simplifies the process of identifying trends in a company's performance. Although not a guarantee of success, it is fair to say companies with strong trends of growing earnings that use those earnings wisely to build the business likely will continue to do so in the future.

By having all the information in a compact chart, getting a feel for such trends is as simple as reading across a line on the chart. These volumes can be found on the main floor of Hale Library, about four rows behind the information desks, toward the end of the stacks on the left.

Most public libraries also carry a subscription to Value Line, another investment guide that presents a wealth of information on a company in a compact form and provides predictions as to earnings and other investment factors several years into the future.

Detailed information about companies can be found through a variety of free Web sites on the Internet, especially www.stockmaster.com and www.bigcharts.com. These are free services that provide stock quotes, recent news and statistical graphs. StockMaster also provides a research option that offers access to a number of other free resources for information, including earnings estimates, security-analyst reports, insider activity to see if the management of the company is buying or selling shares, competitors and other information.

Stock exchanges also offer a wide variety of information about their listed shares at their Web sites. Information at stock-exchange Web sites, such as www.nyse.com for the New York Stock Exchange and www.nasdaq.com for shares listed on the NASDAQ Stock Exchange and the American Stock Exchange, usually is a little more up-to-date than information offered on free services or in investment books.

As G.I. Joe would say, knowing is half the battle (I can't believe I actually remembered that). With investing, having the information is half the battle. Knowing what to do with it is the other half.

Fine Arts Council submits restructuring proposal to Student Senate

BY LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The newest proposal regarding the restructuring of the Fine Arts Council comes from the council itself. It met Monday with Student Senate members, including the Allocations and Privilege Fee committee chairs.

The first proposal called to eliminate the council. It failed in Senate and is being held in Senate Operations Committee. The second proposal came as a resolution from Allocations and is being held in the same committee.

Gabe Eckert, student body vice president and one of the writers of the original bill, said he would like to look beyond the first bill and the resolution. He said the authors of the original bill will support the new proposal from the council.

"The authors would in general support this," Eckert said. "It moves to empower students and is a step in the right direction."

The proposal has three main parts. Council Chairman Ted Conrad said council members in general are in favor of the proposal, although some might have different opinions on certain points.

Part I: The removal of faculty votes on student organization allocations.

One of the reasons the original bill was proposed was because some members of the council said they felt intimidated by the faculty vote and because Senate felt students should be in charge of allocating student funds. Eliminating the faculty vote would rectify both problems, Eckert said.

Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium and council member, said giving up his vote wasn't a problem.

"I don't like losing my vote, but if it's necessary for the vouncil to continue, I'm going to have to accept that," Martin said.

Others said they felt the faculty vote should stay. Suggestions included making faculty votes count as a one-quarter vote instead of a half vote as it is now. Another option was making all votes closed, or by secret ballot.

Part II: The restructuring of student membership to facilitate increased student leadership.

This would include adding additional appointed positions, the removal of one-year terms or the addition of Senate appointments.

Conrad said no one had run for empty positions in the past two years, so adding more positions wouldn't be feasible.

Part III: The restructuring of the carry-forward allowance.

Each department is allowed to dedicate up to 15 percent of the funds it doesn't spend into a reserve account to be used in the next fiscal year. Funds in excess of 15 percent are placed in the council's reserve account. The proposal suggests the extra money be placed in the Privilege Fee reserve account instead, to be used for emergency allocations.

Senate Chair Jake Worcester said these proposals will be made into a resolution and introduced to Senate at its next meeting Thursday.

The council has agreed to make these changes by Dec. 1. If the council doesn't make these changes by the deadline, the old bill and resolution could be brought up again. Otherwise, the original bill and resolution will lose sponsorship and die in committee.

Charges, court date unclear for K-State defensive tackle

Cliff Holloman, K-State football starting defensive tackle, allegedly committed battery after becoming angry with his female companion, said Sgt. Lynette Woods of the Riley County Police Department.

At 12:18 a.m. Sunday, an officer reported to 612 N. 12th St. after a citizen witnessed the battery.

"He wanted to leave a bar in Aggieville, and his female companion didn't want to," Woods said. "He dragged her out and skinned up her elbows."

What Holloman will be charged with and his court dates are unknown at this time.

Holloman is the second football player to be arrested this year. The other, Nilijah McCoy, who was arrested for illegally discharging a BB gun, is Holloman's back-up defensive tackle.

Skidmore said Toleafoa's death is under investigation.

A memorial ceremony was given for Toleafoa in Bosnia.

Toleafoa was a combat engineer assigned to Company Bravo, 1st Engineer Battalion stationed in Fort Riley before going to Bosnia.

Gay-panic defense barred by judge in Shepard case

BY ROBERT W. BLACK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LARAMIE, Wyo. — The judge in the Matthew Shepard murder case barred the man on trial Monday from using a gay-panic defense.

District Judge Barton Voigt ruled the strategy adopted by Aaron McKinney's lawyers in the beating death of the gay college student is akin to temporary insanity or a diminished-capacity defense — both of which are prohibited under Wyoming law.

"What the defendant is trying to do is to raise a mental-status defense that is not recognized by Wyoming law, and of which there has been no notice and no opportunity for the court or opposing counsel to consider before trial," he said. "Even if relevant, the evidence will mislead and confuse the jury."

McKinney, 22, could face the death penalty if convicted of murdering Shepard, who was lashed to a fence and left to die on the prairie last year.

A gay-panic or homosexual-panic defense is built on the theory that a person with latent gay tendencies will have an uncontrollable, violent response when propositioned by a homosexual.

McKinney's lawyers have said McKinney flew into a drug-induced rage after a sexual advance by Shepard triggered memories of traumatic, youthful homosexual episodes.

Kansas secretary on aging resigns due to grant, travel controversies

BY DAVID MILES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Secretary on Aging Thelma Hunter Gordon resigned Monday amid controversy concerning out-of-state trips and a consulting grant she gave to a former deputy.

In announcing her resignation, Gordon portrayed herself as the victim of political attacks that have taken attention away from other issues.

"Recent attacks on me have drawn attention away from the issue of home and community based services for the frail elderly," Gordon said in a statement. "Rather than continuing to draw fire for issues that are purely political in nature, I've opted to tender my resignation."

Gordon's resignation is effective immediately, and Monday, Gov. Bill Graves appointed his special assistant, Joe de la Torre, as acting secretary.

Don Brown, Graves' spokesman, said the governor intends to name a permanent secretary as soon as possible.

Legislators in both parties criticized Gordon after the Lawrence Journal-World reported Sunday that she took trips to Georgia and Hawaii.

Legislators in both parties criticized Gordon after the Lawrence Journal-World reported Sunday that she took trips to Georgia and Hawaii.

Those trips came while her agency pondered placing frail and elderly senior citizens seeking in-home services on a waiting list.

The department started the waiting list in July, although it now is working on eliminating it. The newspaper also published a separate story detailing a $135,000 consulting grant between the agency and Terry Glasscock, a former deputy secretary on aging.

The consultant, now living in Boston, is a friend of Graves and the brother of House Majority Leader Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan. The majority leader's wife, Joyce, is the governor's chief of staff.

On Monday, Graves announced the Department on Aging has terminated the consulting grant.

"At a time when we're scrambling to find money to serve vulnerable Kansans, I'm going to recommend the money be put back into serving people," Graves said in a statement.

Gordon promised to reimburse the state for what she acknowledges were $740.52 in expenses inappropriately billed to the state from the trip to Georgia, which Gordon and agency spokeswoman Sandra Moran made in late March and early April.

But she defended her trip to Hawaii in late June for a conference on aging issues, which cost the taxpayers $2,442.14.

The trip to Hawaii came only a week before Gordon's department started the waiting list for frail and elderly Kansans seeking in-home services.

Company apologizes after popular software secretly releases music preferences

BY TED BRIDIS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The company that produces a popular software program for listening to music on computers apologized to users Monday and promised not use the software to secretly collect details about music preferences of its customers.

RealNetworks Inc. of Seattle said it will distribute a small patch for customers of its free "RealJukebox" software to block the tracking technology. More than 12 million people use the software, which puts it among the most popular programs for listening to compact discs and digital music on the Internet.

A security expert, Richard M. Smith of Brookline, Mass., found the software secretly transmitted to the company's headquarters details about which music CDs each customer listens to and how many songs he copies, along with a serial number that could be used to identify him.

RealNetworks insisted it never stored the information, which would have been lucrative for marketing purposes.

"We made a mistake in not being clear enough to our users about what kinds of data was being generated and transmitted," said Rob Glaser, the company's chief executive.

He said officials deeply apologize.

Smith said he was pleased to see the software patch.

"Sometimes the devils are in the details," Smith said. "It sounds like a nice press release."

Privacy groups had expressed outrage that RealNetworks never disclosed its practices in the privacy statement on its Web site or in the software's license.

Online discussion groups were filled Monday with blistering comments about the company. Some experts went so far as to call the company's music software a Trojan horse, a malicious computer code that promises to perform one function but secretly commits nefarious digital deeds.

In an early response to the controversy, RealNetworks updated its privacy promise on its Web site last weekend, saying its tracking technology was intended to understand the interests and needs of users so they can offer valuable personalized services.

PAYTON

stiff-armed and barreled over tacklers in the open field almost as often as he dodged them.

Against Buffalo in 1979, he took off from the 2-yard line and landed a yard deep in the end zone — on his head. In one of his more famous runs, he bounced off every defender on the Kansas City Chiefs.

"There were guys who ran with the ball better, faster," Ditka said. "But I don't think anyone ever ran with more determination than Walter."

Payton was unstoppable at every stage of his career. His 3,563 yards rushing at Jackson State was one of nine school records he set, and he scored 66 touchdowns. He led the nation in scoring in 1973 with 160 points, and his 464 career points set an NCAA record.

Because Jackson State was a Division I-AA school, however, Payton didn't get the same attention as players at bigger colleges. Still, the Bears were impressed enough to draft him fourth overall in 1975.

As a rookie, he started seven games and rushed for 679 yards and seven touchdowns. The next year he had the first of what would be 10 1,000-yard seasons, rushing for 1,390 yards and 13 touchdowns.

In 1977, just his third year in the NFL, Payton won the first of two MVP awards with the most productive season of his career. He rushed for 1,852 yards and 14 touchdowns, both career highs. His 5.5 yards per carry also was the best of his career.

Against Minnesota, he ran for 275 yards, an NFL single-game record that still stands. In 1984, he broke Jim Brown's long-standing rushing record of 12,312 yards.

"It's grossly unfair to judge Walter Payton solely on the yards he gains," former Bears general manager Jim Finks said when Payton was elected to the Hall of Fame in 1993. "He is a complete football player, better than Jim Brown, better than O.J. Simpson."

After Payton carried mediocre Chicago teams for most of his career, the Bears finally made it to the Super Bowl in 1985. Chicago beat New England 46-10 in the Super Bowl, but Payton didn't score in the game. He was so upset that Ditka later apologized to him.

Payton retired after the 1987 season, and the Bears immediately retired his No. 34. In 13 years, he had only missed one game — in his rookie season.

Following retirement, Payton became co-owner of an auto-racing team. He served on the Bears' board of directors, and became part-owner of an Arena Football team after unsuccessful efforts to buy an NFL franchise. He also ran a restaurant and other businesses in the Chicago area.

Payton is survived by his wife, Connie, and their two children, Jarrett and Brittney.

average life expectancy in water of 58 degrees is five to six hours.

Searchers found what Larrabee called a significant piece of the aircraft, large enough to require a crane. They also located a signal, most likely one of the plane's black boxes, while scouring a 9,000-square-mile area off Nantucket.

The Navy will use underwater sonar equipment to try to pinpoint the wreckage and the black boxes, which are at depth of about 270 feet. The USS Grapple, a sonar-equipped salvage ship that helped retrieve wreckage from the 1996 crash of TWA Flight 800 off Long Island and the 1998 crash of Swissair Flight 111 off Nova Scotia, was expected to arrive from Virginia by this morning.

As of midday Monday, only one body had been recovered, but Larrabee said searchers had begun to see evidence of further human remains. He would not elaborate.

Flights were being arranged to carry victims' relatives to Rhode Island so they could be close to the search operation. Dozens of grief counselors from the Red Cross and other organizations were on hand.

Some of the human remains, and aircraft debris such as evacuation slides and life preservers, were brought to the Quonset Point Naval base near Newport.

After the crash, investigators were sent to check on the EgyptAir ground crew at Kennedy.

time in many years, there was a real plan to raise faculty salaries.

"What we've heard now is that there were too many tax cuts in the economic good times," he said. "Now they have to pay for it and money will be tight, including money for higher education."

Oleen said this is why she voted against the plan last year.

"Now we have a situation with a plan that does not have dollars behind it," she said. "Passing a bill without bucks is a problem."

Like Wefald, Oleen said she will remind people of the promise they made earlier this year.

"I'm going to hold all my colleagues and myself responsible for this funding," she said. "The plan was agreed to and the dollars need to be there."

There are two solutions to raise salaries paid to teachers, Gray said.

"We could abolish some institutions of higher education," he said. "Nobody, including me, wants to do this.

"Communities are too proud of their colleges," he said.

The better solution would be for the legislators to realize that the state has many universities and it is their responsibility to fund them, Gray said.

Gray said Kansas should make raising faculty salaries a higher priority.

"The faculty here is very dedicated to the university and the students," he said. "It's a shame in Kansas that we don't even pay them average."

Making salaries more competitive would benefit not only the faculty, but also students and the university.

"Kansas State students are best off with outstanding faculty," Gray said. "This will keep the best and brightest faculty here and recruit the best and brightest."

with experience and contacts with Kansas politicians and business people.

"I learned a lot about the process of the government as well as how important it is to be involved, especially at the state and local levels," he said.

Wirth said he attended committee hearings, wrote press releases and helped with research.

Potter said Kansas has one of the best internship programs in the country. He said interns can make political decisions before an item is discussed in the newspaper or on television.

"I hope they see what it's really like and what legislators endure everyday. We expect them to be citizens, but they are really on call 24 hours a day," Potter said. "Public service is a sacrifice on time, but it's a beautiful reward."

Judge overrules Giuliani in museum decision

By TOM HAYS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — A federal judge restored city funding Monday to the Brooklyn Museum of Art, ruling that Mayor Rudolph Giuliani violated the First Amendment in cutting off the money over an exhibit featuring a dung-encrusted portrait of the Virgin Mary.

In issuing a preliminary injunction, U.S. District Judge Nina Gershon said the city's action against the museum was directly related, not just to the content of the exhibit, but to the particular viewpoints expressed.

"There can be no greater showing of a First Amendment violation," she said.

"The ruling shows that the mayor's behavior was lawless," said Floyd Abrams, a leading First Amendment attorney who is representing the museum.

The decision does not end the legal fight. Abrams said the museum will try to end to the dispute once and for all by obtaining a permanent injunction protecting funding. City officials said they will appeal.

"The judge is totally out of control," Giuliani said.

The mayor has branded the exhibit sick, sacrilegious and unworthy of taxpayer support.

Aside from the portrait of the Virgin Mary fashioned with elephant dung, the show includes mannequins with genitals as facial features, a glass tank featuring a fake cow's head and 20,000 live maggots, and farm animals bisected and displayed in formaldehyde. The exhibit has drawn record crowds, paying $9.50 per ticket.

After the museum refused to cancel the show, the city withheld the roughly $500,000 October payment of its annual $7.2 million subsidy. It also sued to evict the museum from the city-owned site it has leased for more than 100 years.

The museum filed a lawsuit of its own, claiming its First Amendment rights had been violated by the freeze on its subsidy, which represents about a third of its annual budget.

City attorneys argued the museum broke its lease, creating grounds for eviction. The museum's lease requires it to educate schoolchildren and the public. Giuliani said the art was not fit for children to see, and the city argued the issue was a legal and not a constitutional one.

Gershon decisively rejected that line of reasoning.

7 dead in shooting at Xerox building

■ Suspect surrenders to police following 5-hour armed standoff.

By BRUCE DUNFORD
The Associated Press

HONOLULU — In the latest outburst of workplace violence, a Xerox copier repairman shot and killed seven co-workers in his office building Tuesday morning, authorities said. He surrendered after a five-hour armed standoff with police.

Police believe Byran Vyesugi, a 15-year Xerox employee, shot seven fellow copier technicians about 8 a.m. (noon CST) before fleeing in a company van with a gun.

He eventually stopped several miles away in a leafy, residential neighborhood. Police cordoned off the neighborhood and began negotiating with him about two hours later.

Some five hours after the shooting began, Vyesugi emerged from the van, walked to the back of the vehicle with his hands raised and then fell down on the ground. His brother had helped in the negotiations.

SWAT teams raced toward him with automatic weapons drawn. No shots were heard, and no injuries were reported.

"It appears as though it was a disgruntled employee who snapped," Mayor Jeremy Harris said. Police would not comment on a motive though.

Vyesugi, 40, was being booked for investigation of first-degree murder, which carries a mandatory penalty of life without parole.

The gunfire erupted in an industrial section of Honolulu, far from the Waikiki tourist district. Five victims were found dead in a conference room, and two other bodies were found nearby. All had been shot with a 9 mm handgun, authorities said.

Police found 20 9 mm shell casings at the scene. At Vyesugi's home, they found 11 handguns, 5 rifles and two shotguns.

The victims — male Xerox employees — were shot on the second floor of the two-story building, authorities said. They ranged in age from 33 to 58.

"It's a shock for all of us. We have such a safe community with almost no violent crime," Harris said. "To have someone snap like this and murder seven people is just absolutely appalling."

Vyesugi was a member of his high school rifle team and had up to 17 weapons registered in his name. "This could have been much, much worse," Harris said.

By late morning in Makiki Heights, a residential neighborhood near the shooting scene, negotiators were talking with the suspect through a bullhorn. He was seen pacing back and forth outside the van.

Police cordoned off a half-mile area around his van, which was near the Hawaii Nature Center. About 60 fourth-graders and 12 chaperones were on a nature hike when police told them to get to higher ground. A school bus with two rifle-toting police officers then took the students to safety.

Due to a mistake printed on the Free Application for Federal Student Aid, the U.S. Department of Education was forced to recall 100,000 of these forms.

The department did not include information on where to find the requested information, including deductible IRAs and/or Keogh payments and the untaxed portions pension from IRS form 1040.

The forms, which usually would be available this month, will not be redistributed until January, said Jack Taylor, assistant director of student financial assistance.

"The federal government has said they promise to be swift and get these out as soon as possible," he said.

The priority deadline at K-State will still be March 1, and financial aid will be awarded in late March and early April as previously planned, Larry Moeder, director of financial assistance, said.

At K-State, between 15,000 and 17,000 applications usually are received by the priority deadline, Taylor said. Many K-State students like to fill these forms out during winter break, he said.

"It's an inconvenience because at K-State we usually have a good number of applications in by March 1," he said. "It's going to be a little more difficult for students to do it this way."

For students who are concerned with making the deadline, they still can apply over the Internet.

"This is our opportunity to encourage students to use the Internet," he said. "The process over the Internet is approximately two weeks

Integration, construction, higher enrollment highlight 1950s

Some students wished Josie, the wife of a K-State student, wouldn't nurse her baby so openly. That was the sentiment of many students living in the barracks, which were nicknamed 'Splinterville.' These were the first on-campus residences for men, many of whom returned from World War II and had wives. They shared their space with others — mainly cockroaches.

Winter was bitter because the barracks had no insulation. Students would trudge to Bessie's Beanery, the school's cafeteria, to warm up with food and hot chocolate.

Robert Acre, a 1950 Kansas State College graduate, was among the soldiers returning from the war. He said there was no adjustment period for him, although there was talk about the ratio of men to women.

"There were five men for every lady," Acre said. "Figure that out."

Other than that, college life was good to Acre.

"It was wild," he said. "The only trouble we had was partying too much. That's all I'm going to say about it."

Living arrangements, however, might have hampered the social life of those living inside Memorial Stadium. There were 150 men sharing the Ed Klimek Hall, which was filled with double-decked beds and personal lockers. Lights had to be out by 10 p.m., and there was one pay phone for everyone.

Life at K-State in the 1950s was full of changes: construction of new buildings, an increase in enrollment and an adjustment in attitudes.

Challenging tradition

The opening of Ahearn Field House in 1950 ushered in a decade of construction. More than 10,000 fans showed up to see the Wildcats play Utah State — the largest crowd to ever attend a basketball game at K-State.

"It was outstanding. It was dirty," said Andy Galyardt, a 1954 graduate, referring to the dirt floor in the bleachers. "The thing that was fun was you were there to support your team — win, lose or draw."

Although everyone welcomed the basketball team and its new house with open arms, some were more reserved when it came to the football team. But not Ralph Graham.

As a K-State football coach, Graham wanted to recruit black players. Supported by K-State's president Milton S. Eisenhower, Graham announced the university wanted black personnel on its teams.

"I liked their attitude," he said. "They were all there at practice, and they were all raring to go."

However, not everyone took the news well. Before Graham announced his decision to the news media, he was pulled aside by Missouri coach Don Faurat.

"'For God's sake, don't ever do that,'" Graham said he recalls Faurat saying.

"I told him it should have been done a long time ago," Graham said. "He was not my friend after that."

When the team traveled, it would separate. Not everyone could stay at the same hotel, so one of the men would always go and sleep with the black players, Graham said.

There also was racial discrimination in Aggieville. One anonymous proprietor was quoted in a 1953 Collegian issue as saying, "It used to be my policy not to accommodate Negroes in my restaurant, but I asked customers how they felt about it, and they didn't have any objections."

Although many establishments discouraged black customers from entering, attitudes were changing.

Increasing popularity

As time went by, other traditions were worn down. There were twice as many men as women enrolling in 1953, and an increasing number of students also enrolled in untraditional classes for the times. Two women enrolled in agriculture, nine women enrolled in veterinary medicine and seven men enrolled in home economics.

With an increase in student enrollment, certain buildings literally were sagging under the pressure.

The "pest house," as nicknamed by students, housed two patients in each of the eight crowded rooms. It was discarded in 1959 because some floors had sunk as much as four inches due to termites. Barracks, instead, were used as the epidemic ward.

Alcohol policy does not affect rising numbers at fraternities

By KELLY EVENSON
Kansas State Collegian

There is a growing trend among fraternities to go dry because of recent incidents of binge drinking at fraternities throughout the United States.

This growing trend of not allowing alcohol on fraternity property has not hindered many fraternities' numbers at K-State, Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said.

Houses remaining, many looking at the option

"Everybody's recruitment numbers are pretty much the same — in the 20s and 30s," Robel said. "There was a campaign a few years ago when several fraternities jumped on the band-wagon to go dry, but since then I haven't really seen many more."

There are four dry fraternities on campus — FarmHouse, Alpha Gamma Rho, Delta Upsilon and Beta Theta Pi. However, many of the 23 remaining houses are taking some sort of initiative to create a substance-free environment.

Mike Stamm, recruitment chair for FarmHouse and junior in agronomy, said FarmHouse has been dry since its establishment at K-State in 1921. He said the house has taken it one more step: FarmHouse also does not allow alcohol at functions and will not participate in any functions where alcohol is present.

Stamm said this policy has not in any way hindered recruitment efforts, but instead has helped.

"A lot of guys are more interested in this house because of things that have happened at other fraternities recently," Stamm said. "By being a dry fraternity, we can come together at parties and not have the added pressure of making the decision to drink. That is something that needs to be made outside of the house."

Robel said Sigma Nu and Phi Gamma Delta

U.S. savings bonds for sale around clock in cyberspace

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Americans are getting a new place to buy U.S. savings bonds — they're on sale in cyberspace.

A new Internet site called the Savings Bond Connection, which started operating Tuesday, will let people buy savings bonds online 24 hours a day, seven days a week. It's the latest step by the Clinton administration to make savings bonds easier to buy and a more attractive investment for Americans.

Approximately 55 million Americans own savings bonds worth $185 billion.

"It never used to be possible to buy a savings bond at 2 in the morning on a Tuesday. Now it will be," said Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers, who unveiled the Web site at a news conference today. Winston and Barbara Caperton of Warrenton, Va., made the first online purchase for their granddaughter, Noa.

"By bringing savings bonds as close as your home computer, this program makes it more convenient for millions of Americans to add to their savings," Summers said.

To purchase savings bonds online, consumers will go to www.savingsbonds.gov and link to a page to conduct a transaction, officials said. Online buyers will provide information, including name, Social Security number and mailing address, just as they do when they purchase bonds from banks and other financial institutions.

House passes bill to shield elderly from deceptive mail

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The House moved Tuesday to shield senior citizens and other consumers from sweepstakes mailings that suggest they have to buy products to win prizes or tell them they are winners when they are not.

The measure, passed by voice, follows a 93-0 Senate vote in August on nearly identical legislation and hearings last spring at which elderly people told of spending their Social Security checks or squandering life savings as a result of misleading promises of riches.

"Seniors are ruthlessly targeted by these companies and the more they respond, the more mailings they receive," Rep. Steve LaTourette, R-Ohio, said.

The bill, which has the backing of the Clinton administration, would require sweepstakes companies to make clear that no purchase is necessary to enter the contest and that buying magazine subscriptions or other goods does not improve the chance of winning.

Owner of National Enquirer purchases 3 rival tabloids

NEW YORK — In a deal that would combine the best-known supermarket tabloids, American Media Inc. — which owns the National Enquirer, the Star and the Weekly World News — is buying the publisher of the Globe, the Sun and the National Examiner for $105 million.

The deal to buy Globe Communications Corp. was announced Tuesday.

It is the first acquisition by American Media since it was purchased in May for $300 million by a New York investment firm headed by former Deputy Treasury Secretary Roger Altman.

The combined company will be one of the largest publishers of celebrity-driven content in the world, with an annual revenue of $400 million, David Pecker, chairman of American Media, said.

Facing declining circulation, the National Enquirer has been trying to improve its credibility by moving away from stories about Elvis sightings and alien abductions.

But other parts of the American Media family are sticking to more traditional tabloid fare. A recent issue of Weekly World News has a story about the exact day the world will end and another about UFOs being piloted by angels and demons.

Family settles with airlines in Colombian plane wreck

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A long legal battle stemming from a 1995 plane crash is over, following a settlement reached between American Airlines and a former Kansas City family.

Mercedes Ramirez Johnson, 24, was one of four survivors of Flight 965, which crashed in the mountains near Cali, Colombia. Her parents, Benjamin and Mercedes Ramirez, died.

Johnson and other family members brought three lawsuits against American, alleging that the airline's negligence caused the crash. Dozens of other families also sued in federal court in Miami.

Johnson, who now lives in Maryville, Mo., said the family was eager to avoid a legal fight that promised to last at least two more years.

Johnson's sister and grandmother also made claims against the airline in the deaths of Benjamin and Mercedes Ramirez.

"It's been a very long process," Johnson said Monday. "I think this will bring closure to a sad part of our lives."

Both sides agreed to keep the settlement amount confidential.

Richard McLeod, the family's attorney, would not comment about whether the airline admitted responsibility.

dent health in 1948, recorded the following observation, "Envision, if you will, standing at the bedside of a patient and witnessing that patient cringe in fear as the building above him shifted from side to side."

Strong winds were not the only problem. Lafene also noted that walls readily broke on slight impact.

The student health center, which was condemned by the hospital division of the state Board of Health, was brimming with students in 1957. Fifty of them had to be hospitalized, so the Old College Hospital had to be opened.

The hospital used to be part of a farm; later it became an old custodian's house and then housed K-State's president. After 1918, it was converted into a men's hospital and later was closed due to an epidemic of the measles and the flu.

Once it reopened, extra nurses, kitchen help, tray carriers and one extra cook were hired. In one week, 1,200 students were seen, and during the peak of the epidemic, 52 trays were prepared three times daily.

K-State's smooch lines, in which men and women lined up and kissed each other on the cheek, also were prohibited during the epidemic. Many group activities were canceled and all senior women's specials were postponed.

"Certainly, we're not trying to cut out engagements or pinnings," Margaret Lahey, associate dean of students, was quoted as saying in the Collegian. "After we made the ruling, the number of announcements did not drop even one percent,"

The lack of adequate facilities prompted K-State officials to ask the Legislature for money, but it said tax money would be used only for academic buildings. Lafene then contacted Mrs. Orville Burtis, an influential local resident. Lafene's reasons were simple, and they worked:

"Never underestimate the influence and ire of women aroused," he wrote in his observations.

Another building that took a while to build was the Student Union. Twenty-seven years after the idea was proposed, the Union was completed. Surveys were sent to students asking them what they thought should be in the Union. An overwhelming majority wanted a craft room, which would include wood work and leather crafts. There also was discussion of installing a post office, a theater and a darkroom for photography, but these ideas were rejected.

The temporary Union, meanwhile, supplied students with a snack bar and table tennis. Although it had been a serviceman's club and had soft green walls, and red and cream leather-and-chrome furniture, students enjoyed it.

"Our Union was the barracks. It was like a mobile-park home," Galyardt said. "It wasn't a shining star, but if the people are nice, it doesn't matter where you are."

While the Union was being constructed, there was controversy about what it should be called. The name K-State Union, as opposed to Student Union, conveyed a better message and a feeling of community, said a union director from the University of Wisconsin in 1953.

But a bigger name controversy emerged in 1959. K-State was known as Kansas State College, and President John McCain wanted it changed to Kansas State University. Responses, however, were negative for the most part.

"President McCain explains that his student body has voted overwhelmingly in favor of it. Which is a childish reason. Kansas is not a rich state. We are barely able, in money and in true scholarship, to support one institution worthy of being called a university, and this is at Lawrence," read the Leavenworth Times.

"No doubt, residents of that other Kansas university will now have to call it Cow University instead of Cow College," The Peabody Gazette-Herald said.

Married and in school

Other proposals began to take place. The new housing project for married students was under way in 1958. A year later, 24 married couples moved into Jardine Terrace Apartments. Living rooms were barely big enough for a couch to fit in; paper was falling from the walls, occupants had to share bathrooms and there were no doors in the rooms. The Jardine pamphlet stated that no grand pianos, dishwashers or home freezers were to be brought in.

Janice Waters, a 1953 graduate, said couples were marrying younger at that time. Waters got engaged in high school and then went to K-State with her fiance.

"Living in the dorms was a fun experience," she said. "I had a diamond, and a lot of girls thought that was great."

After she got married, Waters moved with her husband into a "horrible little apartment." She began working as a secretary, but Waters said she didn't have any secretarial skills.

Waters said she would have taken more classes if she had been more ambitious, but she said going to school mainly was something to do while her husband graduated.

"My whole life was just involved in our life together," Waters said. "We had a wonderful life. It worked out fine."

K-State was considered by others as a place to find someone and get married.

"It was a great place to find a wife," Galyardt said. "My fondest memory was finding a beautiful, loving wife."

Forgotten details

During the shuffle of new students, new buildings and a new decade, certain stories remained forgotten. There was a time in 1957 when a gong and the cries of "Sangi man, sangi man," announced the arrival of two sandwich men, who were students who sold food four nights a week between 9 and 10:30 p.m. to sororities and fraternities.

There also was the Canteen, or the "Can," which was the local hangout. Dale Simmons was the owner and the PMAC, or the popular man at the can. There was an open-cash register where students made their own change for pinball and other games.

The same year, a dog named Waldo won the hearts of many. Waldo, a fraternity mascot, was seen everywhere on campus; he went to classes and to the recreation center. One time, he was on the football field celebrating before the game was over.

"All my college memories were great," Galyardt said. "It probably affected my studies because I had too much fun."

Disaster in Manhattan

■ A flood ripped through Manhattan and much of the Midwest in the spring and early summer of 1951. K-State turned over all facilities to the American Red Cross and city maintenance. Residents were forced to evacuate their homes and were quartered in the East and West stadiums. National guardsmen occupied much of the downtown area, where the water was knee-deep. Emergency headquarters were set up in the Student Union.

■ One of the city's two water mains broke. The break presumably was caused by pressure of flood waters and the washing away of soil around the main. City residents were worried the other main also would break, leaving the city without a usable water supply, but the other water main remained intact. The floods left the water unsafe to drink.

■ The flooding caused Midwest farmers much grief. About 55 percent of the wheat acreage was declared dead, and the rest was doubtful. Corn fields also were flooded, and many farmers were forced to replant their crops.

Campus Improvements

■ James McCain became president of Kansas State College in 1950, succeeding Milton S. Eisenhower.

■ Ahearn Field House opened Dec. 9, 1950, for the first basketball game against Utah State University. The field house was the fifth largest in the nation, originally seating 14,000 fans. On Feb. 12, 1955, the field house and gymnasium officially were dedicated to Mike Ahearn.

"Ahearn was responsible for much of the push that changed the field house from a hazy dream to a sturdy reality," the 1955 Royal Purple reported.

■ KSDB-FM 91.9 went on air April 2, 1951. It was in operation weekday afternoons and evenings.

■ Two all-female dormitories opened in 1951 and 1952. They were sister halls to Van Zile Hall, which was built in 1926. Northwest Hall, which opened in 1951, now is known as Boyd Hall, and Southeast Hall, which was completed a year later, now is Putnam Hall.

■ Fraternity Hell Week was outlawed in 1956 by the Intrafraternity Council by a 20-2 vote.

■ The new Student Union opened. Union Governing Board was established to oversee its operation.

■ A bachelor of arts degree was made possible for the first time at January commencement exercises in 1958.

Athletics

■ An athletics scandal in 1950 rocked Kansas State College. K-State played a basketball game in Madison Square Garden against Long Island University. The Wildcats lost to the nationally ranked LIU by 60-59. It later was discovered that three LIU players had taken bribes to reduce the margin of points by which they won. LIU canceled all remaining basketball games and dropped out of intercollegiate athletics.

■ Kansas State College basketball won first place in the Big Seven in 1951 and 1956. In 1951, the team was ranked second by the NCAA. In 1956, a team of inexperienced sophomores and a few returners led the team to the division championship.

■ The football team did not share in the same success. The team finished the 1950 season with one win, nine losses and a tie. Its victory was against Baker University, and the tie was against Wichita State University. The team lost every conference game.

Kansas needs to look at option of tax hike

If a Kansas politician wanted to raise state taxes, it would be political suicide. In the future, however, that needs to change. Politicians and taxpayers need to be more willing to explore all funding options, including raising taxes.

We could face trouble if we don't make consideration of a tax raise a viable political option. We are facing those troubles right now, in part because we haven't been willing to consider all options, and the state is running short on money.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

The Kansas Legislature passed an appropriations bill this year that would give $70 million to Kansas Board of Regents universities and community and technical colleges in the next four years. Now, we're faced with cutting corners because the state didn't raise all the money it appropriated. One of the losers could be the regents schools and specifically K-State, as $20 million of the spending package is to be used to increase faculty salaries at K-State.

Earlier this week, K-State President Jon Wefald visited Gov. Bill Graves, urging him to commit to the four-year package that the legislature passed. It is to be hoped that Graves will do just that and commit to spending. In doing so, he will be investing in the future of Kansas.

At K-State, faculty salaries lag far behind those of peer institutions. We need good faculty at state schools to keep the best and brightest Kansas students in Kansas. Having excellent faculty also attracts students from out-of-state to Kansas.

The goal is for those students to stay in Kansas after graduation. With their education, they will have more earning potential, and part of their salaries will go to the state in taxes.

That's the ultimate goal, but K-State needs the $20 million promised by the Legislature to reach it. If that money must at first come from an increase in taxes, it is an investment in our future that Kansas citizens should be willing to make.

I think the greeks and independents need to stop dogging on each other. It's time for us to unite and start making fun of the marching band again.

I just wanted to congratulate our band for having a really great performance this Saturday. Thanks, it's the best it has been in four years. Keep up the good work.

What do you call 5,000 independents at the bottom of Lake Erie? Who cares? They're not greek.

When the Ricky Martin tour comes to Kansas City, I think all K-State students — greek and independent — should go and live la vida loca.

Money Makes the World go 'Round

Lust for wealth leads to gaping worldwide inequalities

There's something to be said for capitalism, especially by Americans. After all, this is the land of opportunity, the place where anyone can go from having nothing to rolling around in a pile of conspicuous consumption in a matter of years. To earn more money than one could ever possibly use in a lifetime — isn't that the American dream?

Of the world's 100 largest economies, 51 now are global corporations, rather than countries. Wait — let me repeat that. Of the world's 100 largest economies, 51 now are global corporations, rather than countries. Wal-Mart, Ford Motor Co. and General Electric are in the Global 500's top 10. That's right — Wal-Mart is worth more than a lot of countries.

Mergers between already-huge corporations now, are commonplace, with each new merger breaking size records only months old. When Germany-based Daimler-Benz bought Chrysler last year, it created the world's second-largest corporation, DaimlerChrysler. In a similar move in 1998, British Petroleum bought Amoco, which sparked a wave of oil consolidation, including a proposed merger between Exxon and Mobil.

Scary business. So many white men holding so much power and money, it's hard to fathom. Even harder to fathom is the fact that there exist people, actual humans, who are worth more than countries in terms of money.

Bill Gates, Microsoft Führer and professional nerd, is worth about $98 billion. Costa Rica is worth about $24 billion, or about $6,700 per person. Bill Gates probably uses more than that to wipe his butt each day. Other countries Gates could buy and sell include Guatemala, Kuwait and Estonia.

Of course, many would argue that it's just a simple fact of capitalism, and anything less than that would border on communism, oh me, oh my. But which is worse — a country with socialistic tendencies that might be construed as communistic, or a country run by plutocrats? We all like to kid ourselves by saying all we want are the most qualified people to be our leaders, but the truth is all we really want is a solid bottom line. Hence Ross Perot. Hence the assumption that George W. Bush is going to roll over the other candidates come November 2000.

We love us some money. We are a shallow, greedy country with attributes that, if personified, would make for one friendless, unhappy soul. Somehow countries can be as such, and rather than negative, it is cast in a positive light. We are the world's leader in capitalism, in democracy and in leadership, gosh darn it!

Bill Gates is worth $98 billion. Then there exist people, actual humans, who are not worth, in terms of money, the grass mats they sleep on. Money, money, everywhere, and not a cent to spend on those who truly need it. Rather than erasing the debts Third World countries owe us, we continue to not only demand repayment, but we also charge an considerable interest rate. Meanwhile, we allow American companies to merge with similar companies, creating conglomerates that have larger economies than the countries from which we are demanding repayment of debts.

None of this is of particular importance to those with the bucks. These are people who somehow can sleep soundly at night with their isolationist ways of life. People who would not sleep soundly if there was any sort of cap on their earnings. People who balk at the idea of graduated income tax. People who have the power to help the rest of the world, but refuse to.

God bless the U.S.A.

Recent passing of great athletes evokes consideration of what makes true heroes

Heroes all too often let us down. They either pass away or show us just how human they really are by making mistakes. Rarely do our heroes live up to our expectations.

The reason, perhaps, is that they are mortal, and that's the part that sucks. Walter Payton, Payne Stewart and Wilt Chamberlain all have left us far too soon. They all ended up losing their greatest battles — the fight for life.

In the short time they were here, they left our lives richer than they found the world.

Still, I refuse to believe that heroes do not really exist. I refuse to give up hope that all the good people are gone. Perhaps we simply need to cut our heroes some slack and instead just admire them.

There are those people who teach us how to do right and who have certain qualities we admire. We look at a basketball player take a jump shot, and we want to emulate him. We look at a movie star act on a screen and say "I want to be Matt Damon", or "I want to date Liv Tyler."

The problem with those beliefs is whether they are a sports star, an actor or a politician, they are human and likely will let us down.

Take, for example, K-State defensive coordinator Phil Bennett a coach who has had a season filled with tragedy. Bennett lost the love of his life, but he refuses to stop living. Instead, he is working every day, on and off the field.

He is a man working his rear-end off as a football coach, but more importantly simply trying to raise his two children.

In a lot of people's eyes he is a hero. Still, it would be unfair for me to place that label on him. He is a human being, and he is far too busy being a father and coaching a team to worry about being a hero.

You see, it is time for the world to stop putting people on pedestals only to watch them fall. Instead, let's admire people for the qualities we like and leave it at that. It is time for us to identify our heroes not as perfect, but rather accept their imperfections.

The following are characteristics that might help us find heroes.

A prospective hero needs to be honest. Kansas City Chiefs head coach Gunther Cunningham is a prime example of a person who will tell it like it is. He doesn't pull any strings, because he realizes that he cannot afford to.

He is paid to win football games, and Cunningham knows honesty is the way to win.

Think about how much simpler all of our lives would be if we subscribed to the honesty policy. Relationships would be a hell of a lot easier. You could forget about all the rules, and simply enjoy being yourself. Isn't that all we want? Who honestly enjoys the games associated with dating?

Something else we need of our heroes is hard work. Their job can be anything, but they need to go to work, stand on a line and battle until the day is done. Nothing earns respect quicker than a hard worker and a person who is dependable.

Another quality a hero needs is to be giving. America needs more people who would rather please others than themselves. This might sound stupid, but I really think the definition of love is when you are willing to go out of your way to make another person happy.

Perhaps the most admirable quality a hero can possess is the willingness to take a stand. Those heroes are people who have their convictions and stand up for them. When all they want to do is cry, they somehow find the intestinal fortitude to raise their heads high and fight back — taking all the world has to throw at them.

Those are the components that make a hero. Those are the types of traits a hero should have. Maybe I was wrong about the aforementioned Bennett. He sounds like a hero already. But no pressure.

I hear he has a lot to do.

New movie to remind Americans of dangers of cigarettes, untruth from tobacco industry

Editor,

When the film "The Insider" premieres at movie theaters across the country Nov. 5, large numbers of Americans will discover or be reminded of what the public health community has long known: that Big Tobacco will go to nearly any length to lie and to hide the truth about the danger of its products.

For more than 40 years, tobacco companies probably have known that cigarettes are physically addictive and deadly. These products cause the deaths of more than 400,000 Americans every year and condemn millions more to a lifetime of dependency. For years, Big Tobacco has hidden behind a legal and public relations smokescreen.

Industry representatives portrayed smoking as safe while they in fact were conducting research on creating less lethal products. As the companies claimed cigarettes were not addictive, their scientists secretly were working to making them even more so.

Fortunately, public health advocates, state attorney generals and industry whistleblowers have exposed Big Tobacco's lies and distortions, leading to last year's $206 billion tobacco settlement and to Philip Morris making a long-overdue admission last month that smoking indeed is "addictive, as that term is most commonly used today."

The battle against smoking is far from over, however. Although Joe Camel has faded into memory, Big Tobacco is still seeking ways to legitimize itself and its deadly products. For example, Brown and Williamson recently has been portraying itself as "a responsible company in a controversial industry," and Philip Morris has been touting its charitable giving in a blatant attempt literally to buy community goodwill.

We know better, of course. We must continue to highlight the hypocrisy of an industry that hides behind its feel-good philanthropic efforts and related public relations initiatives as it simultaneously endeavors to addict new consumers.

The fight against Big Tobacco is one our country simply can't afford to lose.

K-State student captures American Star Farmer award

BY RHONDA NIDA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Among more than 2,000 American FFA Degree recipients at the 1999 National FFA Convention, one K-State student accomplished his dream of being named a star.

Michael Springer, senior in agricultural economics, brought home the highest award presented to an FFA member after being named American Star Farmer last week in Louisville, Ky.

"It was really exciting," he said. "On stage with me was my mother, father, FFA adviser and high school superintendent. It was really special to have my family there to experience the excitement on stage."

The Star Farmer award recognizes people who have excelled in their agricultural programs in the areas of growth and quality, along with leadership both inside and outside of the FFA organization.

"Having a strong program in FFA is the same as having a successful business," he said. "I feel that if you make good business decisions, learn from your mistakes and always strive to move forward, one can be successful in any facet of business. Keep in mind that your motives should be to operate a successful agricultural business, not win an award."

Springer spent four days in Louisville, Ky., as a finalist for the Star Farmer award. Along with other finalists, he toured businesses in the area and attended a reception and luncheon with the contest judges.

Springer said the toughest part of the week was the suspense of waiting from the end of his interview until the announcement of the winner.

"I was a nervous wreck from 4 p.m. to 8:45 p.m. on Thursday," he said. "I thought my interview went well, but all the finalists had very similar programs and knowledge of the industry.

"I think the judges had a tough decision to make."

Cory Epler, senior in agricultural education, said Springer had numerous K-State students cheering him on during the convention. Springer's entourage was supportive, and winning the award was exciting for everyone, Epler said.

Epler said few people understand how big a deal the honor is for Springer.

"Those familiar with the FFA realize the size of this honor," he said. "They are very excited for Michael, but at the same time, he brought a great honor to the Kansas FFA, K-State and the College of Agriculture.

"The fact that Michael is following his dream to return to the family farm is incredible. We need people like him in production agriculture, people who are willing to try new things and serve as role models for our industry. That is why he deserved to be Star Farmer of America, and that is why he won."

Springer received a $1,000 cash award, a plaque and the opportunity to interview with various radio and TV stations.

Springer said the award belongs to everyone in his family.

"This award represents my love and respect for food production and the agriculture industry," he said."It recognizes the goals I have strived for and the people who have helped me accomplish them."

Crash investigators say intact bodies not likely to be recovered

BY PAT MILTON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEWPORT, R.I. — Crash investigators informed stunned relatives Tuesday that intact bodies were not expected to be retrieved from the shattered wreckage of EgyptAir Flight 990. Some relatives fainted.

"Everybody was screaming and crying, because they weren't expecting to hear something like that," said George Arian, an Egyptian community leader from Jersey City, N.J., who has been acting as a spokesman for the families and described what happened behind closed doors.

An ambulance was brought to their hotel in case any needed medical care after the grim briefing by National Transportation Safety Board officials.

About 80 relatives arrived in Newport on Monday, and 132 people — including the chairman of EgyptAir and several Egyptian aviation investigators — landed Tuesday.

The USS Grapple, carrying divers who will try to retrieve the plane's flight data, cockpit voice recorders and debris, arrived in Newport this afternoon from Norfolk, Va.

A signal believed to be from one of the "black boxes" was detected Monday by Coast Guard searchers, who also found the first large piece of wreckage from the plane. The search is concentrated 60 miles south of Nantucket Island in water some 270 feet deep.

The boxes could provide key clues for hundreds of investigators trying to determine why the Cairo-bound Boeing 767 plunged 33,000 feet without warning into the sea early Sunday, a half hour after leaving Kennedy International Airport in New York.

All 217 people on board were killed.

According to Arian, NTSB officials told relatives at Tuesday's briefing that identifying victims could be extremely difficult because of the small size of the human remains being retrieved. Only one body has been recovered, and even that one was not intact.

"Everybody here from the Egyptian families expected to see his loved one, his brother, his sister, as a body that they could identify easily," Arian said. "The news was a shock to all of them."

The investigation is expected to take months and cover many areas, from potential human error and mechanical failure to the possibility of sabotage. Authorities say there is no evidence suggesting foul play.

About 600 FBI agents from New York, Los Angeles and other bureaus were involved in the investigation.

The FBI took a bomb-sniffing dog to an unidentified Los Angeles hotel after an EgyptAir crew member complained to management that a briefcase had been tampered with, CBS News reported Monday.

The dog reacted to sugar in a hotel room, The New York Times reported Tuesday, citing a law enforcement source. The sugar and loose wires found in the room are being analyzed, but investigators reportedly don't believe there was ever a bomb or bomb material in the room.

Egypt's government confirmed Tuesday that 33 Egyptian military officers were on the plane. A source said they included two brigadier generals, a colonel and a major. The officers were returning to Egypt after undergoing training in the United States, part of extensive military exchanges between the two countries.

The officers' ranks had been kept off the passenger manifest for security reasons, Egyptian officials said.

FBI investigators in Newport said they had no information suggesting that the presence of Egyptian military officers might have made the flight a sabotage target.

The victims also included 106 Americans, many of them retirees embarking on group tours to the Nile River region of Egypt.

Across Narragansett Bay from Newport, crash debris and human remains were being unloaded at Quonset Point, a former Navy base where investigators will try to reconstruct the shattered plane.

A temporary mortuary was being set up in a Quonset Point gymnasium, and a team including forensic pathologists, dental experts, X-ray technicians, forensic anthropologists and the FBI disaster squad was deployed to help identify the remains.

The Whiting, a vessel normally used to survey ocean coastal waters and make nautical charts, arrived at the crash site early this morning with computer equipment that will analyze winds, tides and currents to determine where wreckage may drift. Its side-scan sonar — essential during the TWA and Swissair crashes — emits sound and analyzes echoes as part of the search.

The Coast Guard, fearing bad weather by tonight, has stepped up its search for debris and human remains.

Debris collected so far — some of it by student sailors from the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy — includes shoes, purses and twisted, sodden teddy bears.

None of the retrieved debris has any burn marks that might indicate a fire or explosion, search officials said.

Government rules require the capsules holding flight data and cockpit voice recorders be able to withstand pressure at 20,000 feet under water and resist corrosion from salt water for 30 days. The pinging sounds are supposed to be emitted every second for 30 days.

The sonar-equipped Grapple helped retrieve wreckage from the 1996 crash of TWA Flight 800 off New York's Long Island and the 1998 crash of Swissair Flight 111 off Nova Scotia.

Jim Hall, chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board, said divers face an especially daunting task this time. Flight 990 crashed in water twice as deep as Flight 800."

Kansas woman dies in EgyptAir crash

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OVERLAND PARK, Kan. — A woman from Overland Park was a passenger on the doomed EgyptAir Flight 990.

Lois Neufeld was a retired nurse in her 60s, according to Ed Hurley, who manages the apartment complex where she lived.

"I saw her Friday morning," Hurley said. "She said, 'I'm going to the Holy Land for vacation.' I said, 'Bring some of that holiness back with you.' She laughed and gave me one of her smiles."

Meanwhile, grieving relatives hoping for answers and Navy divers searching for clues converged in Newport, R.I., now the command post for the vast investigation into the crash of EgyptAir Flight 990.

A signal believed to be from one of the black boxes was detected Monday by Coast Guard searchers. The search is concentrated 60 miles south of Nantucket Island.

The boxes could provide key clues for investigators trying to determine why the jet plunged into the sea early Sunday, after leaving Kennedy International Airport in New York.

Betty Delfosse, social director of the apartments where Neufeld lived, said she was well thought of in the community.

"She was just kind to everyone," she said. "We're taking this very hard."

MURPHY'S LAW

K-State's No. 1 running back prepares for return after being sidelined by injury

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Resiliency.

Running back Frank Murphy has become the epitome of the word.

With three regular season games left for the senior who hasn't touched the field for four weeks, one would have to ask— what more could happen to one person and how many chances does one get?

Murphy's chance to make another return to the field could come Saturday when the No. 6 Wildcats (8-0, 5-0) face the Colorado Buffaloes (5-3, 4-1) at KSU Stadium after having surgery on his left ankle following the Texas contest on Oct. 2.

Head coach Bill Snyder said Tuesday that Murphy will be in the mix of things at running back against the Buffaloes and that his recovery has been progressing well ahead of schedule yet again.

"Frank is a possibility this weekend. He's come back to this point, ahead of schedule of what was the original prognosis," Snyder said of Murphy's injury.

Sophomore receiver Aaron Lockett said Murphy's contribution will be a great addition to the offense for the stretch run.

"Anytime you can get Frank back it's going to be a definite asset to the offense," Lockett said. "The speed factor he brings and the fire, the knack to get into the end zone is going bring a lot to the team again."

Everyone is aware of the first leg of Murphy's rollercoaster ride when he accepted gifts from Garden City, Kan., boosters prior to the past season to purchase a vehicle, which in turn resulted in a four-game suspension from Snyder and the NCAA. Oddly enough, Murphy returned from the suspension to face the Buffaloes in Boulder last season.

Then, when things began to look up for the once-National Junior College Player of the Year, he broke his right ankle prior to the season. Murphy, who initially was expected to be out for four to six weeks, made what was said at the time to be a miraculous recovery, making it back in time to play in the first four games this season. In the season Murphy has totaled 450 yards and four touchdowns, while

Cats' BCS chances nearly non-existent

If you thought Rodney Dangerfield was disrespected, hold on to your hats. The K-State Wildcats get absolutely no respect. None.

Even though K-State played its most complete game of the season, clubbing the Baylor Bears 48-7, the Wildcats dropped a spot in the Bowl Championship Series standings. That's what happens when you're stuck playing the hapless Baylor Bears.

At No. 6 in the BCS, K-State is on the outside looking in when it comes to the national championship game taking place at the Nokia Sugar Bowl on Jan. 4.

This is what we know: barring some huge upset (and I mean huge), either Florida State or Florida will play in the national title game. Florida State plays host to Maryland, and then travels to Florida. The Florida Gators play Vanderbilt, the winless Gamecocks of South Carolina, and then play host to FSU.

If FSU wins, it secures its spot at the top and its bid to the title game. If Florida pulls off the upset (if you can call it an upset) it would jump in the polls and would all but secure its spot in the Sugar Bowl. Either way, one of these two teams will be playing for a national title.

That leaves one spot open in the Sugar Bowl. Penn State, one likely candidate, has a tough remaining schedule. It plays host to Minnesota and Michigan and travels to Michigan State. Both Michigan teams are ranked, and Minnesota still is receiving votes in both polls. Penn State definitely has the hardest road to New Orleans.

Virginia Tech, another contender, still has four games to play, but the schedule favors the team. It plays a feisty, but mediocre, West Virginia team, and a Miami team that has shown a few moments of greatness. The other two teams in sight are Temple (need I say more?), and Boston College, which actually lost to Temple.

The Hokies just need to play solid to end the season undefeated.

If K-State finishes the season undefeated and wins the Big 12 Championship game, the Cats still will have to hope for some miracles to happen elsewhere. Everyone is quick to tell the Wildcats to focus on their schedule and everything will work out. Here's the reality — even if the Wildcats end the season at 12-0, they still have to hope that both Penn State and Virginia Tech lose.

The reason for K-State's troubles is simple: strength of schedule. No, I'm not complaining about the teams Snyder schedules. I am complaining about the way the BCS incorporates the strength of schedule figure into their poll. This is what bugs me — every single poll takes strength of schedule into consideration when they rank their teams. It's a must. No respectful poll would be without it. How else do you explain K-State's No. 6 ranking in numerous polls despite the team's unbeaten record? You can't justify putting Florida and Tennessee above the Wildcats unless you take schedule strength into account.

Even with this knowledge, the BCS uses strength of schedule itself. This figure accounts for one out of the four quartiles. Without it, K-State would rank ahead of both Florida and Tennessee. The BCS is trying to force every team in the nation to schedule the Green Bay Packers as a non-conference team. It's ridiculous. Strength of schedule plays a role in the individual polls, and then is added again as a part of the BCS. In essence, strength of schedule plays one of the largest roles in determining the best teams.

Of course, K-State's strength of schedule gets better as the season ends. Playing Colorado, Nebraska and hopefully the Big 12 championship game likely will boost us in the BCS. But even with this schedule the Cats still might get left out.

Last year, the BCS makers gave a collective sigh of relief when both K-State and UCLA lost a game on the last day of the season. Had both teams won, the BCS would have left an undefeated team out of the title game. Instead, the national championship was played by Florida State and Tennessee, and the BCS creators patted their own backs on a job well done. If K-State goes undefeated, the BCS will be sweating once again. Unless Penn State, and Virginia Tech lose, an undefeated team will be left out and the protests will start.

For the sake of the Wildcats, and the lives of the BCS creators, pray your heart out for some major upsets at the top. Otherwise, this could be the start of a major BCS revolt.

Rangers trade Gonzalez to Detroit Tigers

BY CHARLES RICHARDS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ARLINGTON, Texas — Juan Gone is long gone.

Juan Gonzalez, a two-time AL MVP and one of baseball's most feared hitters, was traded by the Texas Rangers to the Detroit Tigers in a nine-player deal Tuesday.

"We've been working the last couple of years to acquire a marquee player," Tigers general manager Randy Smith said, calling Gonzalez a franchise player and future Hall of Famer.

Going with Gonzalez to Detroit were pitcher Danny Patterson and catcher Gregg Zaun.

The Rangers received pitchers Justin Thompson, Alan Webb and Francisco Cordero, outfielder Gabe Kapler, catcher Bill Haselman and infielder Frank Catalanotto.

Gonzalez, known as "Juan Gone" for his home runs, was the AL MVP in 1996 and 1998. The Tigers have until Saturday to exercise a $7.5 million option on him for next year, and the sides spoke shortly after the trade was made.

Gonzalez, 30, is eligible for free agency after the 2000 season.

"We just weren't prepared to ... go into next season with that over our heads," Rangers general manager Doug Melvin said.

"I guess it heated up over the last couple of days," Melvin said. "We had talked about it at length. Randy Smith has been on vacation in Hawaii, so it was a long-distance call trying to get the deal done."

Smith, celebrating his wedding anniversary in Maui, said, "If you're going to deal with premier players, there's always a chance they'll walk. But you have to dare to be good.

"It's very difficult to entice a free agent to come to a city that hasn't won recently," he said. "Most players have to experience Detroit to see how good it is to play here."

Gonzalez, a two-time All-Star, hit .326 with 39 home runs and 128 RBIs this year. He led the Rangers to the AL West titles in 1996, 1998 and 1999, yet all three seasons ended in disappointment, as each time they were eliminated in the first round of the playoffs by the eventual World Series champion New York Yankees.

Detroit went 69-92 last season and finished third in the AL Central, 27 1/2 games behind Cleveland in their final season at Tiger Stadium.

The Tigers hope for a fresh start next season when they move into new Comerica Park under newly hired manager Phil Garner.

"Over the last few years, we have worked hard to develop a farm system with a high talent level and strong depth," Smith said, without which "we could not have made today's deal."

Melvin said Thompson is highly regarded, although the left-hander underwent arthroscopic surgery on his pitching shoulder Aug. 26. At the time he was put on the disabled list, then-manager Larry Parrish said Thompson was beat up mentally.

"Whenever there's surgery, there's a certain amount of risk involved," Melvin said. "He was pitching hurt, and that was affecting his last few performances."

Thompson, 26, was 9-11 with a 5.11 ERA. He was an All-Star during his first full season in 1997 but has been slowed by injuries.

In 11 seasons with Texas, Gonzalez batted .294 with 340 home runs and 1,075 RBIs.

He batted .314 with 47 home runs and 144 RBIs in 1996 as Texas won its first division title, and batted .318 with 45 homers and 157 RBIs in 1998.

The Puerto Rican native put up more big numbers last season, but his production was somewhat overshadowed by his refusal to play in the All-Star Game and the strong offensive production from teammates Rafael Palmeiro and Ivan Rodriguez.

With Gonzalez, the Tigers got Patterson and Zaun, both 28.

Griffey wants out; Mariners agree to seek trade deal

BY JIM COUR
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — Ken Griffey Jr., wanting to play closer to his home in Florida, rejected Seattle's eight-year contract offer, and the Mariners said they will try to trade the 10-time All-Star.

Seattle presented Griffey a new contract proposal July 17 — a deal thought to be worth $135 million, which would have made Griffey the highest-paid player in baseball.

"This has been an extremely difficult decision for me," Griffey said in a joint statement he released with the team. "Mariners' fans throughout the Pacific Northwest have been very loyal and devoted to me. I will truly miss them."

Griffey hit 48 homers this year after hitting 56 in consecutive seasons. The center fielder, who turns 30 later this month, has 398 career homers and is thought to have the best chance among current players of breaking Hank Aaron's record of 755.

"The Mariners agreed to Ken's request and will seek to trade him during the current offseason," the joint statement said.

Griffey, who has veto power over any deal because he is a 10-year veteran, has played five years with the Mariners.

Volleyball team set to battle Buffs

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 17 K-State volleyball team is looking to get back on track tonight as the Wildcats battle No. 24 Colorado at Ahearn Field House.

K-State (15-5, 9-3), after losing three of its past four matches, is looking to regain its winning consistency against the Buffaloes (13-8, 7-5) at 7 tonight.

Colorado is 3-7 on the road this season and 0-5 against teams ranked in the Top 25. On the other hand, K-State is 5-2 at home and posts a 4-3 mark against ranked opponents.

The Wildcats will be looking to sweep the Buffaloes for the first time since 1987.

In K-State's Oct. 2 meeting with Colorado this season, the Wildcats defeated the then-No. 21 Buffaloes, recording K-State's second consecutive victory over Colorado at the Coors Event Center in Boulder, Colo.

But the Buffaloes have won three straight matches over the Wildcats in Manhattan and have a 10-2 all-time advantage over K-State at Ahearn.

However, this year the Buffaloes will be playing in Manhattan in front of a home crowd that ranks No. 3 nationally in attendance. Ahearn has averaged more than 2,600 fans this season in seven home matches.

The Wildcats' tenacious defense also should pose problems for Colorado. K-State has held 14 of its 20 opponents to a hitting percentage of below .200, including five under .100 this season. The team is 13-1 when holding its opponent to a hitting percentage below .200.

K-State will try to contain Colorado sophomore Sonja Nielsen, who leads the Buffaloes, averaging 3.9 kills per game.

In turn, Colorado will attempt to maintain Wildcat senior Dawn Cady, whose 5.62 kills-per-game average ranks No. 3 in the nation. Sophomore teammate Liz Wegner's average of 5.22 also sits No. 13 nationally.

SUDS founder sets sights on high office

BY LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

What do you get when you mix beer-drinking buddies, a guy and his Web page and student government? A student body president, of course.

Or at least that's what Richard Maxwell hopes.

Maxwell, junior in business administration and president of the Student Underground Drinking Society, said he hopes to take his group's popularity and turn it into a campaign for a more prestigious position.

ON THE WEB
Those looking for ways to join SUDS can visit the website www.networksplus.net/suds.

SUDS is an organization dedicated to the party-goer. As a freshman, Maxwell said he didn't have the connections to find parties every weekend, so he started a mailing list for people to advertise their parties.

The mailing list grew into a Web site and since has grown in numbers as well. The group started with 40 members and now boasts more than 500.

"We get 120 hits on the Web site a day and about 20 to 30 people join a day," Maxwell said.

Maxwell said SUDS isn't just a party group; it's also a social group and a way for people to meet each other.

"It's especially important to freshmen to get to meet people. It's a good social organization," Maxwell said.

Now Maxwell said he will use SUDS's growing numbers to help put him into office as student body president.

"It will be a serious campaign, not a joke," Maxwell said.

One of the reasons Maxwell said he thinks it's important to run is because most student government positions belong to members of the greek system. SUDS is known as a greek alternative, but Maxwell said he isn't against the greeks in any way.

"We're not anti-greek. We're pro-independent," Maxwell said.

"They hold the positions because they are organized. We were not organized."

Maxwell changed that by creating a government system within SUDS. Each residence hall has representatives and senators of SUDS. There also are off-campus senators and representatives. Maxwell said because he has members in every residence hall, he has an early lead in the polls. However, some members who are signed up on the Web page as senators didn't even know they were senators.

"Somebody just signed me up. Probably one of my friends. I don't do anything in the group, really," said Melanie Rockets, freshman in agricultural business and Ford Hall senator.

Despite a few non-involved members, there are those who truly enjoy their SUDS position. Maxwell serves as president, and Jeff Wilke, junior in civil engineering, vice president of SUDS, will be Maxwell's running mate in the spring.

Austin Taber, freshman in open-option and senator for Moore Hall, said Maxwell would make a great president.

"Everybody has positive qualities. He seems like he's outgoing and has some initiative. I think he'll be an extremely effective president, although he probably won't be received well by the university," Taber said.

The first droppings of the Barnyard Bingo competition happened about halfway through the course. More than 700 tickets were sold to raise money for the Leadership in Literacy program.

Barnyard Bingo lends hand to literacy program

BY HEATHER WOOTTON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Goats and kindergarten kids don't have much in common. On Friday, however, both were part of the Leadership in Literacy program.

During the Homecoming parade, Leadership in Literacy sponsored a Barnyard Bingo contest to raise money for the program, part of the Retired Seniors Volunteer Program. Leadership in Literacy targets elementary school-aged children who might need help learning to read, Donna Peterson, event organizer, said.

"RSVP seeks to help the community in different ways," she said. "The seniors went into the schools and found that lots of kids needed help."

Peterson is one of eight Americorps volunteers working on the literacy program, which is in its second year.

"Americorps is the domestic equivalent of the Peace Corps," she said. "We look for social need in communities and work to solve the need."

The program offers one-on-one tutoring at Woodrow Wilson and Bluemont Elementary schools. It also has a full-day kindergarten program at Bluemont Elementary, which is the only full-day program in Manhattan, Peterson said.

"This program really helps kids academically, and the interaction with an adult boosts their self-esteem," she said.

The program tracks participants for three years after tutoring to monitor academic success, Peterson said. Eventually, the program will expand into all elementary schools in Manhattan and will be turned over to the community.

"We want to get the program going strong," Peterson said. "It makes a tremendous difference in the lives of these little people."

The idea for Barnyard Bingo came from an Americorps volunteer in Nebraska, who used the idea in her hometown.

Peterson said the original idea was to use several different types of animals in the contest, but ended up with goats because they were smaller and more manageable.

Contestants bought tickets that corresponded to a marked area, called a plot plop, on the parade route. If an animal "plops" on the contestant's plot, the contestants were eligible for cash or other prizes. Peterson said the support from participants and community businesses was overwhelming.

"I think we sold at least 700 tickets, plus we got the cash prizes worth $600 and 20 different door prizes," she said.

Jane Lamb, who owns the three goats in the contest, said she was contacted through a K-State Division of Cooperative Extension agent who thought she might like to help with the literacy program.

"I have a son with a learning disorder, so I know how important it is for kids to learn to read well so they can do well in school," Lamb said.

Lamb didn't do anything special with the goats to prepare them for their moment of fame, although she did ask her veterinarian about how long before the contest she should feed them.

Peterson said the program expansion likely will bring more fund-raisers in the near future.

"There is already a lot more to do this year," she said. "We have been really busy."

The program needs more male volunteers, Peterson said.

"We really are lacking male role models for kids," she said. "All you need is some patience and a love of kids."

KSDB requests extra funds

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KSDB-FM 91.9 made a preliminary request of $13,054 to the Privilege Fee Committee on Tuesday.

If granted, the request probably would not mean a change in privilege fees for K-State students, committee Chair Ryan Walker said.

The station's current budget is $42,676 for operating expenses and a station manager's salary.

The request follows last year's budget increases and station audit, which revealed large discrepancies in the way funds were used at the station.

"This committee and these students certainly have plenty of reason to see how we're spending money," said Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications. "Last year was a crisis. Anything would be easier than that."

The audit showed the station needed changes in overall management of operations, depositing all university receipts into a university account, time and leave reporting and changes in personal phone-call policies.

"There is no question we are in compliance this year," Simon said.

Dave MacFarland, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, said the traumas of last year are gone.

"We have the first real budget that looks forward and backward," he said. "We are serving students more effectively than we ever have, and we have more student involvement and listening."

Committee member Ted Conrad, host of "A Purple Affair," said the needs are legitimate and need to be addressed.

"The figure that the committee saw was the first glimpse of the KSDB finances and what is really necessary for the budget," he said.

The station also introduced an outline of equipment costs for a move to the K-State Student Union.

The equipment would cost $38,005, not including remodeling the space, labor, furniture or soundproofing.

No action was taken on the request.

The committee also passed a bill to provide additional funds to Student Publications Inc. The bill was passed to Senate 10-0.

If passed by Senate, the operations budget will increase by 5.88 percent to $269,994 and the equipment budget will decrease 4.76 percent to $60,001.20.

The increase won't affect student fees, Walker said.

China eventually could employ cyber attacks to invade Taiwan

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TAIPEI, Taiwan — In five years, China could be able to use computer viruses, hackers and other types of cyber warfare to break down Taiwan's defenses and prepare for an invasion, the Taiwanese military said Tuesday.

Taiwan's economy, government and military are highly dependent on computers and could be vulnerable to a high-tech assault, the official Central News Agency quoted Chang Jia-sheng of the Defense Ministry as saying.

The agency reported Chang said Taiwan should form a team of experts to prepare the island for possible cyber warfare.

China's cyber arsenal could include computer viruses, hackers and electromagnetic pulses that would disrupt communication networks and create chaos, he said.

The high-tech weapons could take out their targets quickly without much expense or loss of life, Chang said. They could destroy public morale, spread disinformation and cause instability, giving China an excuse to move in and take over the island, he said.

Chang said that although China is technologically backward, it has been able to leapfrog in the past and quickly acquire technology for nuclear weapons, intercontinental ballistic missiles and satellites.

Acquiring the ability to use cyber warfare against Taiwan by 2005 is within China's reach, he said.

China and Taiwan have been ruled by separate governments since they split during a civil war in 1949. Beijing considers the island to be a breakaway province and repeatedly has threatened to use force to reunify the two sides if Taipei seeks formal independence.

Taipei has said it will reunify with China gradually once the mainland becomes democratic and more economically developed.

City Commission votes to create board to oversee low-income housing

By TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City commissioners unanimously voted Tuesday to separate Housing Authority's function from the city of Manhattan, delegating responsibilities to a new five-member board.

The resolution makes the Housing Authority, which owns and operates 262 units of public housing, an agent, rather than a division, of the city.

City Manager Gary Greer said the separation would provide additional influence and power to residents of the low-income housing.

Greer and Commissioner Ed Klimek said the city is disconnected from Housing Authority.

"I am seeing holes here," Klimek said. "I am admitting I don't do a good job. I think as a City Commission we have to come to grips with the situation and make it better. We have a responsibility to your needs as residents."

The resolution abolishes the Public Housing Authority Advisory Board and creates a new board to oversee Housing Authority. In conjunction with requirements from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, one member of the board must be a resident of the low-income housing.

Commissioners said the board should have more than five members to allow for additional residents and possibly a commissioner. Board members will be appointed by Mayor Roger Reitz, with agreement from commissioners.

Chris Bailey, chairman of the Housing Advisory board, said board members should be chosen carefully to provide an outlet for resident concerns.

"I would want to address concerns of residents in a consistent manner," he said. "We have been hearing more lately, though they haven't all been negative."

The city will retain ownership of the housing units, though it waives power concerning Housing Authority to the board. The resolution will become effective upon the appointment of five members to the board.

Greer said the current structure of Housing Authority is an inefficient and ineffective way to operate the city's low-income housing units.

"We don't give it enough importance," he said. "I don't think we are spending enough time managing this important area."

In other action, commissioners unanimously voted to approve the Manhattan Economic Development Opportunity Fund Advisory Board recommendations in its accountability report for 1998.

Ron Fehr, assistant city manager, said MEDOFAB has created about 1,650 jobs since 1995.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said MEDOFAB is a success story, including strong contributions from the private sector concerning economic development in Manhattan.

"I would have expected that we would have had failures, just by looking at the numbers," he said. "It's not true for Manhattan."

The review ensures companies that receive funds from MEDOFAB are in compliance with any agreements in place and allows commissioners to check business accomplishments with projections made in applications to MEDOFAB.

Focus of PBS documentary to present lecture Tuesday about women's roles in religion

Fans of the PBS documentary "Battle for the Minds" will have the chance to visit with the film's focus next week, thanks to the Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

Molly Marshall, professor of theology and spiritual formation at Central Baptist Seminary is Kansas City, Kan., will present the lecture "100 Percent Heaven Made? Religious Authority and Its Impact on Women" at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in the K-State Student Union Little Theatre.

"I think the title refers to the fact that women are just as fully human as men and just as blessed of God as men," Marshall said.

"Battle for the Minds" depicts Marshall's experience in 1995 when she was forced to resign from her teaching position at Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville, Ky., due to her advocacy for women in senior pastorate positions in the church. Marshall, who now refers to herself as an American Baptist, said her resignation was the turning point in her move away from the Southern Baptist Convention.

"I moved toward a more inclusive Baptist society," she said. "The Southern Baptist church was much too narrow and did not support the increasing role of women in the church. It was too recalcitrant on certain issues."

Beverley Earles-Law, coordinator of the lecture series, first became interested in having Marshall as a speaker after her Women and Religion class viewed "Battle for the Minds." Earles-Law said she would show the film to those completing internships through the lecture series.

"I think the title refers to the fact that women are just as fully human as men and just as blessed of God as men."

— Molly Marshall, professor of theology and spiritual formation, Central Baptist Seminary

"I'm going to show it to my interns so they can get a feel of what she went through," she said. "The experience of being forced to resign was excruciatingly painful for her, but she clearly managed to get through it all without leaving the church altogether."

The transition to the Central Baptist Seminary was difficult at first, Marshall said, but she said she has enjoyed the adjustment.

"It's a place of freedom and educational integrity, and that's fun," she said. "It's not as insular as Southern Baptist."

The point of Marshall's lecture will be on what she calls the second Reformation, marked by the influx of women as clergy, and the way it has started to change the church's internal workings despite resistance.

Marshall said she wanted her audience to walk away with the idea that women should be given even more chances in the church.

"I want to convey that I think the changes going on in the church are for the better, and that the reforming momentum provided by women is positive," she said.

The lecture, part of the series that honors one of the founding members of the UFM's Community Learning Center, is free of charge and open to the general public.

Campus organization joins crusade to free imprisoned American Indian leader

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

An organization that attempts to help not only the community of Manhattan and the United States but also those suffering in other nations is available for those looking to affect a change in the world today.

Amnesty International fights to provide basic rights to the individual, such as the right to vote, said Kim Weir, co-president of K-State's Amnesty International chapter, which will meet at 8 p.m. Nov. 8 in Union 209.

"Our chapter goes off that same idea, but on a smaller scale," Weir said.

Naomi Wood, faculty adviser, said although the group is concerned with protecting all human rights, the local chapter is most concerned with prisoners' rights, such as those concerning fair trials, torture and slavery.

Wood said the group fights for rights on behalf of people who have been imprisoned because of an ethnic or religious-minority background.

"We advocate for people who have been imprisoned for their beliefs but who haven't advocated violence," Wood said. "We're particularly concerned that nations abide by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights."

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights is a list of more than 30 points that enumerate basic human rights, such as free speech, marrying as a person wishes, and no imprisonment without a trial, Wood said.

The K-State chapter of Amnesty International soon will join forces to fight for the freedom of Leonard Peltier, the imprisoned leader of the American Indian Movement. In 1973, AIM members moved onto a reservation to protest injustices committed against American Indians, such as repression and treaty violation. The U.S. government responded with military force.

In May 1975, the FBI increased the number of agents on the reservation, especially SWAT team members. In June 1995, two FBI agents entered a ranch occupied by AIM members. A shoot-out began, and two FBI agents died. Peltier was an AIM leader present during the shoot-out, and murder charges were brought against him as well as two other men. The other two men were found not guilty, but Peltier was convicted.

"He is a man that was wrongfully convicted," said Lynn Tufono, co-president of K-State's Amnesty International chapter. "There's no evidence that links him to the murder, and there's no excuse as to why he hasn't received parole."

Wood said there is sufficient evidence proving the trial was run neither properly nor fairly.

Group members said they feel the FBI was prejudiced against Peltier for several reasons, one being his ethnicity, Wood said.

Every Wednesday in November, the K-State chapter of Amnesty International, along with other Midwestern chapters, will call the White House in an attempt to fill the phone lines with calls regarding the imprisonment of Peltier.

"The whole nation is taking part in this," Tufono said. "Regions are picking certain days to call."

For every three calls the White House receives in one day regarding the same issue, a note is sent to the president. It then is considered a matter of national public concern. The group's hope is to fill President Clinton's desk with notes regarding Peltier's freedom, and for him to be released as soon as possible, Tufono said.

"It's a good opportunity to interact with the political system, which a lot of students don't get to do," Tufono said.

Wood said Amnesty International's goal as an organization was to create a sense of international awareness.

"Helping people become aware of what's going on in the world, and to conceive that they can change the things they don't like," Wood said.

Amnesty International offers one main benefit to students, Tufono said.

"You get to know that you're helping someone else, not just yourself," she said.

AT&T, Sprint to raise fees on phone bills

WASHINGTON, D.C. — AT&T Corp. will increase by nearly 40 percent the fees that residential customers pay to subsidize phone service for the poor, people in expensive-to-serve areas and school Internet hookups.

AT&T, the nation's largest long-distance company, plans to raise the fee from 99 cents to $1.38.

The company last week had sought a steeper increase of almost 52 percent, which would have brought the charge up to $1.50. The Federal Communications Commission said Friday it would not approve the larger increase and opened an investigation to determine whether AT&T's fees are justified.

On Monday, AT&T modified its proposal to raise the fee to $1.38 instead of the $1.50. The FCC decided not to challenge the new increase but still plans to review the company's line-item charges. The commission hopes to wrap up the investigation before the end of the year, a commission spokesman said.

AT&T says the fee change is needed to cover higher costs of providing the subsidized services. In July, a federal appeals court ruled that the FCC could only assess fees to subsidize cheaper Internet hookups for schools and libraries on interstate telecommunications services, not in-state services.

Because of that decision, the FCC altered its formula for how it collects money to support the Internet program, shifting a greater assessment onto the long-distance carriers. The companies typically pass these fees to customers in various charges on their phone bills.

Also on Monday, Sprint increased its fees by 18 percent. Residential customers now will be assessed 8.4 percent, up from 7.1 percent, of their long-distance charges to go toward the fund.

MCI said it would not increase the fee it collects from residential customers.

AT&T also said it is looking into joining MCI and Sprint in charging residential customers a percentage of their long-distance calls for the fund, rather than a flat fee.

The company expects to make the transition in the first quarter of 2000.

Consumer advocates criticized this round of fee increases, saying they unduly harm customers who don't make a lot of long-distance calls.

"This is an enormous increase in monthly costs for a majority of consumers who do very little calling," said Gene Kimmelman, co-director of Consumers Union's Washington D.C. office.

In late October, the FCC voted to boost the subsidies that help make phone service affordable for people in rural and expensive-to-serve areas. Companies still are determining how that decision, which takes effect at the beginning of next year, will effect the charges they assess their customers.

K-State students tutor local youth

By MONICA HAYDEN
Kansas State Collegian

While some students spend their free time in front of the television, several dedicated students have chosen to spend their free time helping others.

Through America Reads, America Counts and the Community Service Tutoring Program, K-State students are helping elementary, middle and high school students learn the fundamentals of certain subjects.

"I think it's great the advantages go both ways," said Jayme Wyatt, sophomore in elementary education and second-year tutor with America Reads. "For me it is money, but it is experience foremost. For them, if they are struggling in reading or in math, with America Counts, then it helps them excel in a subject that they are not so great at."

Tutors for America Reads and America Counts are paid through work study, said Angie Sattler, sophomore in elementary education and student coordinator for America Reads and America Counts.

K-State students from all majors are encouraged to get involved, Sattler said.

"I wouldn't say we have a majority of elementary-education majors," she said. "We have all sorts of different majors. We have one tutor that is international business. We have civil engineering. We have a really broad range of students from different areas."

Sattler said there are 27 tutors this year, which is more than last year.

"This year, we have had an incredible response from the students here, people wanting to get involved and past tutors who are tutoring again because they liked the program," she said. "I think it's wonderful because it not only helps out the students that are being tutored, but it also gives the tutors that service experience. In the same aspect, it helps the teachers who have those students who need help."

With only 27 tutors, and because tutors work with students one at a time, there are more students in need of help than there are tutors, Sattler said.

"I would say we have between 75 and 100 students that are being tutored," she said. "We have many more than that who are in need of tutors. Since we are working with some new sites we have a lot of requests for tutors, and of course we haven't been able to place all of those."

Sattler said this year they are working with the Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan and Manhattan-area schools. She said the age group of the students tutored varies.

"The America Reads program is targeted toward kindergarten through third grade. "We do tutor fourth and fifth, but it is targeted toward the younger grades," Sattler said. "America Counts is actually designed to tutor K through nine, but right now we tutor elementary. We don't have any middle or high school sites."

Community Service Tutoring Program is similar to America Reads and America Counts, with the exception that the Community Service Tutoring Program is volunteer based, said Jill Stafford, senior in agricultural economics and student coordinator for the Community Service Tutoring Program.

"Our objective is to assist students that are academically at risk," she said.

Community Service Tutoring Program tutors locally and in surrounding areas. It targets students kindergarten through high school seniors and offers a larger variety of subjects, Stafford said.

"We help in any subject. We help with science and spelling, also with some writing and social studies," she said.

Stafford said there always is a need for more tutors.

"It is very sad to say, but we are seeing a lot more need from our schools and a lot more requests for tutors," Stafford said.

If a student is paid or volunteers to tutor there are always benefits to being a tutor, Stafford said.

"They are learning so much about service and about giving their time and their efforts to others — maybe not reaping tangible benefits, but they are reaping the benefits of seeing how much of a difference they are making," she said. "I think the benefit that they reap is seeing that student succeed and gain that confidence and also the ability to communicate with someone younger or at a different education level than them. That is very valuable."

K-State engineering group receives honor for chapter

The K-State student chapter of the American Institute of Chemical Engineers has been selected as an Outstanding AIChE Chapter for the 1998-99 school year.

The award is based on membership and participation of students and faculty, quality and quantity of meetings and activities and the chapter involvement in local, regional and national events.

The chapter's adviser, Walter P. Walawender, professor of chemical engineering, was named the AIChE outstanding student chapter adviser.

Walawender and the chapter's efforts were recognized Sunday at the organization's annual meeting in Dallas.

Hale Library's architecture recognized at conference

The architecture of Hale Library was recognized for excellence at the annual American Institute of Architects' central states conference in Topeka on Oct. 16.

The architectural firm of Brent Bowman and Associates of Manhattan, and its associate, Hammond, Beeby, Rupert, Ainge Inc. of Chicago received a regional merit award for excellence in architecture.

Hale was selected because of the complexity of the building and how effectively the project was completed, especially its stone and iron work. The library was one of 14 award recipients and the only Kansas entry to be recognized.

Jury starts deliberation in Shepard slaying case

BY MEAD GRUVER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LARAMIE, Wyo. — Jurors began debating the beating death of a gay college student Tuesday after prosecutors gave a dramatic reminder of Matthew Shepard's helplessness during his final moments of consciousness.

Prosecutor Cal Rerucha paused for 60 seconds to let the jury reflect in silence on the one-minute beating inflicted on Shepard before he was left for dead on a fence Oct. 7, 1998.

"Think what 60 seconds was to Matthew Shepard," Rerucha said. "It's a short time if you're eating an ice cream cone. It's a long time if you're descending into hell not knowing what fate will meet you there."

Public defender Dion Custis told the jury that defendant Aaron McKinney, 22, was in an emotional rage at the time of the beating.

"(He) is not a cold-blooded murderer, ladies and gentlemen — he reacted," Custis said.

He said the beating started because of a sexual advance by Shepard, and it continued because McKinney was under the influence of methamphetamine use.

"He hit him too many times. The question is why," Custis said.

Minutes later, jurors began deliberations. McKinney, 22, could get the death penalty if convicted of murder.

About 70 people were in the courtroom, including Shepard's parents, Dennis and Judy Shepard. McKinney's father, William, sat across the aisle.

Prosecutors said McKinney and Russell Henderson, 22, posed as homosexuals, lured the 21-year-old Shepard out of a bar, drove him to a remote fence and pistol-whipped him into a coma. Police said robbery was the main motive but that Shepard also might have been singled out because he was gay. Henderson pleaded guilty in April and is serving two life sentences.

Before resting Monday, the defense had called seven witnesses, including two men who claimed Shepard made unwanted sexual advances toward them.

The judge barred the lawyers from using a so-called gay-panic defense. District Judge Barton Voigt ruled that the strategy adopted by McKinney's lawyers was akin to temporary insanity or a diminished-capacity defense — both of which are prohibited under Wyoming law.

During opening statements last week, McKinney's lawyers said painful memories of a homosexual encounter in his youth prompted him to lash out violently when Shepard made an advance.

A gay-panic defense is built on the theory that a person with latent gay tendencies will have an uncontrollable, violent reaction when propositioned by a homosexual.

quicker, anyway."

Emily Kerschen, junior in English education, has paid for her college education through financial aid. She said she is surprised no one caught the error before the forms were printed.

"If they expect us to get them done in time, they better get them out when they say they will," she said.

Kerschen said it is ironic that the U.S. Department of Education, which gives money to students to receive educations, wasted money on printing the forms with an error this easy to catch.

"It makes me a little skeptical that this won't happen again," she said.

Taylor said he, too, is surprised by the mistake.

"It's unbelievable to me that someone didn't find this before now," he said.

trip also were evacuated in the afternoon.

About 10 homes also were evacuated. Neighborhood residents set up lawn chairs in the streets to watch the situation unfold.

Xerox employees were taken across the street from the building to be questioned by police and helped by counselors. Another Xerox building, in downtown Honolulu, was evacuated in case the gunman headed that way.

Xerox employs 92,700 people worldwide and 148 people in Honolulu.

Vyesugi joined Xerox Corp. in 1984. As a customer service engineer, he traveled to various sites to service and repair printers and copiers, Xerox said.

It was the latest of several workplace killings across the United States this year.

In Pelham, Ala., 34-year-old Alan Miller was charged with killing two coworkers at their office Aug. 5, then killing a third person at a company where he used to work.

One week earlier, Mark Barton, 44, killed nine people and wounded 13 others at two brokerage firms in Atlanta, then killed himself. He earlier had killed his wife and two children.

MURPHY

averaging 6.9 yards per carry.

As horrible as it might sound, life once again made a terrible turn for the worst during K-State's 35-17 victory over the Longhorns. Late in the fourth quarter, Murphy left the game with what appeared to be another ankle injury, but this time it was his left ankle. At the time, the seriousness of Murphy's injury was unknown, and in fact, he made a return to the action to run a couple more plays. Nobody realized they possibly would be the last of the season for the then-No. 2 rusher in the Big 12 Conference.

Even through this turmoil, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said that Murphy continues to be the hardest worker on the team.

"He's been great, upbeat and done a great job for us," Hudson said. "He's established some leadership qualities in letting himself be heard and working hard.

"Frank is probably the hardest worker on the team and continued to do that even though he is hurt. His presence is something that we want to have and like to have around."

One thing that arises with the return of Murphy is playing time for other running backs.

In Murphy's absence, junior Joe Hall has filled the shoes, rushing for 100 yards or more in three of the four games. With junior David Allen now healthy, he is expected to push for the playing time as well.

To make matters worse, the severity of fullback Johnno Lazetich's concussion from last week's game still is unknown and therefore opening a spot up at the position, the same position Hall saw action in to start the season. Senior fullback Ryan Payne also will see some time now with Lazetich's injury.

Hudson said Hall still is the starter at this point in time, considering Murphy and Allen aren't completely healthy right now. After Saturday's win over Baylor, Hudson said that Allen is about 75 percent and Murphy is at 70 percent.

"Right now it's Joe's position," Hudson. "We'll play them if they're a 100 percent. If they're not, then we won't do that.

Despite being thrown numerous road blocks, Hudson said Murphy hasn't lost a step and still is motivated.

"He hasn't dropped off a bit," Hudson said. "He's one that always wants to learn. He's done a great job of that. We have no complaints about Frank Murphy.

"There won't be anybody that will work harder than Frank," Hudson said. "Trust me, he'll spend the time getting himself ready. He's going to comeback fast. You watch Frank."

HOUSES

will be going dry in the future and Theta Chi, a fraternity being established this year at K-State, will begin dry.

"Most of the houses that have gone dry so far have done so because they are following decisions made by the national fraternity," Robel said. "As far as the remaining houses that are not dry, the consensus is a wait-and-see attitude."

Chris Harlow, recruitment chairman for Delta Sigma Phi and senior in interior architecture, said the fraternity will go dry in December 2000. Although this decision was passed at a national convention earlier this year, he said they have been telling prospective members of the future plans.

"I don't think it has hurt us at all because we have so many other things to offer," Harlow said. "Parents help persuade their kids on which fraternity to join. Once they hear of the decision to go dry, their kids make the decision very quickly."

Harlow also said recruitment numbers this year hit 30, which is an increase from last year. He said there is a growing trend for fraternities to go dry, which has helped with recruiting.

"By 2000, I think most fraternities will be dry or on their way to being dry," Harlow said. "There is a trend for fraternities to change their ways, and those that don't follow will be shunned.

"We have this reputation right now of being an 'Animal House' type of environment. Those who don't take the initiative to change still will be looked at with an 'Animal House' type of reputation."

Stamm said the reason many houses are taking the beginning steps toward a substance-free environment is because of liability issues and trends that are occurring throughout the country. But he said some houses might find it harder than others to change.

"There are a few houses who have a tradition of being a fraternity that drinks on the property," Stamm said. "Since they have been that way for so long, it is going to be more difficult to change a way of life that has such a long history."

Stamm said he feels FarmHouse has been a model for other fraternities because of its tradition of being dry since its conception.

"We emphasize the fact that the decision to drink is made outside of the fraternity," Stamm said. "This way there is no added pressure on the members of the house to drink. We have one of the larger houses on campus, and I think many fraternities will start to change their policies in the future because of the trends occurring."

Deadline to register for McCulloh recall election nears

By KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

The last day to register to vote in the Dec. 7 recall election of City Commissioner Karen McCulloh is now.

Anyone who is a Manhattan resident and is registered is eligible to vote.

Election Officer Rich Vargo said the amount of people registering has been about the same since the recall announcement on Sept. 29, but earlier there had been an increase.

"We had a large increase during the petition process," he said.

From May 1 to September, 867 people registered. Last year's July 29 voter registration count was at 21,108, while this year's was at 22,108.

Vargo said his office is in the process of hiring poll workers as well as verifying poll locations. All regular poll locations will be opened during the election, and advanced voting will start Nov. 17.

MCCULLOH

"The staff is doing a great job preparing for this election," he said.

Vargo called the recall election for McCulloh after verifying that a recall petition, filed by three Manhattan residents — Donald Rose, Marvin Zentz and Stanley Hoerman — had the required 2,237 names.

The recall committee filed the petition in June, disagreeing with McCulloh's vote in April to remove a Ten Commandment monolith from the front of City Hall. The monolith, which was donated in 1958 by the Fraternal Order of Eagles, was removed after a 3-2 commission vote.

McCulloh said she will be doing the normal campaigning by getting out to those people who support her. She said she wants to make it clear that she believes this is a misuse of the recall election.

She said the recall election is there for those elected officials who have been dishonest or have accepted bribes.

"This is an issue of whether an elected official can vote their conscience and be removed," she said.

Since this isn't a typical election, McCulloh said it is difficult to know how to proceed.

"It's like running against yourself," she said. "I have been charged with misconduct, but people may look at your past record and vote against you because of another issue they didn't agree with."

She said she thinks this election sets a bad precedent. She said if elected officials can't vote their conscience without a fear of a recall then it will have a negative effect on the local government.

Price of commission recall election for city expected to exceed $15,000

By KELLEE MILLER
Kansas Satate Collegian

The recall election of Commissioner Karen McCulloh will cost the city $15,000 to $20,000, Election Officer Rich Vargo said.

He said that amount will pay for typical election costs like paying the poll workers and other extra workers the night of the election.

This money will come out of the general city fund, City Clerk Rich Doan said. He said this fund pays anything that isn't already specifically outlined and for services that benefit the city.

Doan said the money being spent for the election simply means

Gunman kills 2, remains at large

By PEGGY ANDERSEN
The Associated Press

SEATTLE — A man in camouflage clothing and sunglasses calmly walked in and shot four employees at a boat-repair company Wednesday, killing two of them. The attack came a day after a deadly workplace shooting in Hawaii.

Law officers hunting for the gunman spread a massive dragnet around the area north of downtown Seattle, using helicopters and dogs to search into the night. Residents were told to stay in their houses, while children at 20 schools were locked inside for part of the day before they were sent home.

"He walked in and started shooting. That's all we know," said Pam McCammon, a police spokeswoman. Police said survivors told them the man said nothing before shooting seven to nine rounds with a 9 mm handgun.

The King County medical examiner's office said Russell James Brisendine, 43, was one of the dead. The other fatality was Peter Giles, 26, whose uncles owned the yard.

"He was just a super young fellow," his grandfather, Richard Kelly Sr., told KIRO-TV. Giles had worked at the shipyard since he was 12. "Who would expect for a decent, law-abiding, wonderful citizen to get just shot in cold blood?"

A 19-year-old man who survived with a gunshot wound in his arm said the gunman didn't work at the Northlake Shipyard shop and he had never seen him before. All the victims were men.

The other survivor, a 58-year-old man, remained unconscious in serious condition with a gunshot wound to the chest, hospital officials said.

The suspect, described as possibly in his 30s, was wearing an overcoat over camouflage clothing and a brown hat when he walked in the front door and went to a back office

K-State officials close to reaching soda deal

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

The negotiations for an exclusive drink-pouring rights contract are nearing an end, K-State officials said Wednesday.

It soon will be clear whether only one brand of soft-drink machine will be standing in campus hallways after the new year.

The negotiation process has picked up the pace this week, and a decision could be announced by K-State President Jon Wefald by the end of the week.

Representatives from K-State and representatives from the state purchasing office had a meeting on Tuesday. Tom Schellhardt, K-State associate vice president of administration and finance, said the meeting was productive.

"It went fine, we have gotten closer to a decision on a contract," Schellhardt said. "We may have an announcement by Friday, or it may be early next week."

Schellhardt said the negotiations are going well, and he said K-State is trying to clarify items in the proposal with the vendors before reaching a decision.

The negotiations could go either way between Pepsi Co Inc., or Coca-Cola. Schellhardt didn't comment on the specific items holding up a decision, but he said the university still had some points of clarification.

"We still have some questions, and we have some things that are not clear," Schellhardt said. "If we can get those items ironed out, we will have a vendor chosen."

Pepsi representative Jake Wassenberg said early Wednesday, that Pepsi was working to iron-out questions in the contract, and it was supposed to get back to negotiating parties by the end of the day.

When contacted about the issue later in the day, he said no communication had taken place.

"To my knowledge there has been no correspondence today between us and K-State," Wassenberg said. "If that is wrong, it is possible, but I don't think it is."

Schellhardt said it would be wrong to speculate that one group is the front-runner in K-State's decision.

He wouldn't comment on a specific vendor, but he said one of the proposals answered all of the questions, while the other one did not.

If the university enters into a contract, it likely will be a 10-year contract, and if Pepsi is awarded the contract, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics likely will be included in the contract.

If Coca-Cola is awarded the contract, the university will enjoying an AMERICAN PASTIME story by sharla rowley ■ photographs by jeff cooper

Larry Arensman displays some of the tags he and his wife, Connie, collect in their travels to dances. Traveling is something all square dancers can take advantage of. There are club dances, weekend festivals and state and national conventions every year.

Connie Arensman (right) square dances Tuesday night at the Senior Service Center in Manhattan. Arensman met her husband, Larry, at a square dance, and they travel frequently to dances.

Square dancing offers cheap entertainment, fellowship

John Creviston and Ruby Mann embrace as they square dance at the Seniors Service Center in Manhattan with the Lone Wranglers Club.

It's almost like a family reunion, except everyone is welcome. They only ask that you learn the dances, don't drink and, most importantly, have a good time.

"Square dancing is an American original, a great couple activity," said Jerry Haag, a national caller from Cheyenne, Wyo. "You meet so many people, and it's a great workout. One dance is equal to running three miles, but it's so much fun."

A caller leads the square dances and sings songs telling the square dancers what move to do next.

As a national caller, Haag has traveled all over the world. He tries to make it to the Manhattan area about once a year.

Last month he brought in club members from Topeka; Council Grove, Kan.; Junction City and many other neighboring communities to see him at the Lone Wranglers Club dance, the Manhattan square dance club.

"Every winter we go down to Texas for a month and see Haag," Topeka resident Dorothy Lamb said.

Traveling is something all square dancers can take advantage of. There are club dances, weekend festivals and state and national conventions every year.

"Wherever you go, there is a club dancing," Jeanne Shane, a round-dance cuer, said. "You can just look in the phone book when you are out of town and find an area dance."

As a cuer, Shane calls the moves, one measure ahead of time, for the round dances.

"The best thing about dancing is the fellowship. It's nationwide," she said. "You can go anywhere and meet the same kind of people."

The fellowship and family atmosphere is what attracted Westmoreland, Kan., resident Erika Jensen to square dancing. Originally from Germany, Jensen said she has enjoyed using square dancing to learn better English.

"Since America is where square dancing started, English is the only language the callers use," Jensen said. "It used to be really hard for me to understand, but I have gotten so much better. After I dance, I feel so happy. It relieves my stress."

Jensen said square dancing has become popular with the youth in Germany because of the American style.

However, the number of youth square dancers in the United States has decreased in recent years.

"I guess we stopped teaching the dances for 10 years or something. It would be really nice to see more young people out there dancing," Haag said. "It's cheap entertainment and a lot of good times."

The Lone Wranglers Club has its meetings at 7 p.m. on the second Tuesday of every month at the Senior Service Center. Everyone is welcome.

Packard Bell plans to lay off 1,400 California employees

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Packard Bell NEC Inc., once the second-largest U.S. maker of personal computers, is pulling most of its home PCs from stores because of millions in losses.

The computer manufacturer also said it will lay off 1,400 employees in Sacramento by the end of the year.

The company will stop selling its consumer PC models in stores, except for its Z1 desktop. It is looking into selling over the Internet or through other channels and will continue to sell NEC brand business systems.

Its withdrawal follows IBM's decision last month to stop selling PCs in stores and focus instead on doing business over the Internet.

Researchers did not report 6 gene-therapy study deaths

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Two researchers trying to grow new blood vessels around blocked ones failed to report to the National Institutes of Health that six people died during their gene therapy studies.

Ronald Crystal of the New York Hospital-Cornell Medical Center in Manhattan and Jeffrey Isner of Tufts University in Boston told The Washington Post that they believe the six patients died from underlying illnesses and not from the gene therapy.

The Food and Drug Administration ordered Schering-Plough Corp. to halt new enrollments in two gene therapy studies temporarily last week after a teen-ager in a similar experiment died Sept. 16. University of Pennsylvania scientists had placed healthy genes in his liver to combat a rare metabolic disease.

The researchers in the blood vessel study said they did report the deaths to the FDA, which doesn't release the information. But they said federal regulations didn't require them to tell the NIH because gene therapy didn't directly cause the deaths.

The Post quoted NIH officials as saying that even deaths first appearing unrelated to gene therapy should be reported and made public because the cause of death may not be determined until later.

Judge lifts 42-year-old order restricting newspaper sales

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A federal judge has lifted a 42-year-old order in an antitrust case that prohibited The Kansas City Star from buying smaller newspapers in the area and offering special advertising rates.

U.S. District Judge Gary A. Fenner signed a modified final judgment Tuesday that eliminates the former prohibitions against The Star, which was found guilty of antitrust violations in 1957.

"This is really an historic moment for The Kansas City Star," said Arthur S. Brisbane, the newspaper's publisher. "The modification puts us back on equal footing with other organizations of our kind."

The modified order still allows the government to review in advance any purchase by The Star of a newspaper in the metropolitan area with a price tag above $5 million. Brisbane said newspaper officials are thinking strategically about acquisitions, but he declined to be specific.

The Star was accused in the 1950s of bullying smaller rivals and threatening to ban advertisers from The Star or giving them poor positioning if they advertised with competitors. As part of the consent decree, The Star was forced to give up half of its news media holdings, choosing to sell WDAF-TV and WDAF radio and keep The Star, then an afternoon newspaper, and its morning edition, The Kansas City Times. The two newspapers have since been combined into a morning newspaper under the banner of The Kansas City Star.

"What has changed today is that there are a lot of competitors in Kansas City," Brisbane said, adding the modification was necessary to allow The Star to become more efficient and to compete vigorously with new media rivals, such as cable television and the Internet.

Speaker says American Indians' image misconstrued

BY TRACY DOILE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Education is the means by which American Indian mascot misrepresentation can be overcome, a member of the Comanche-Kiowa tribe of Oklahoma said Wednesday.

Cornel Pewewardy, assistant professor at the University of Kansas, discussed stereotypes of American Indians as they are portrayed by school mascots. Manhattan High School representatives, whose mascot is an American Indian, also were invited to the discussion.

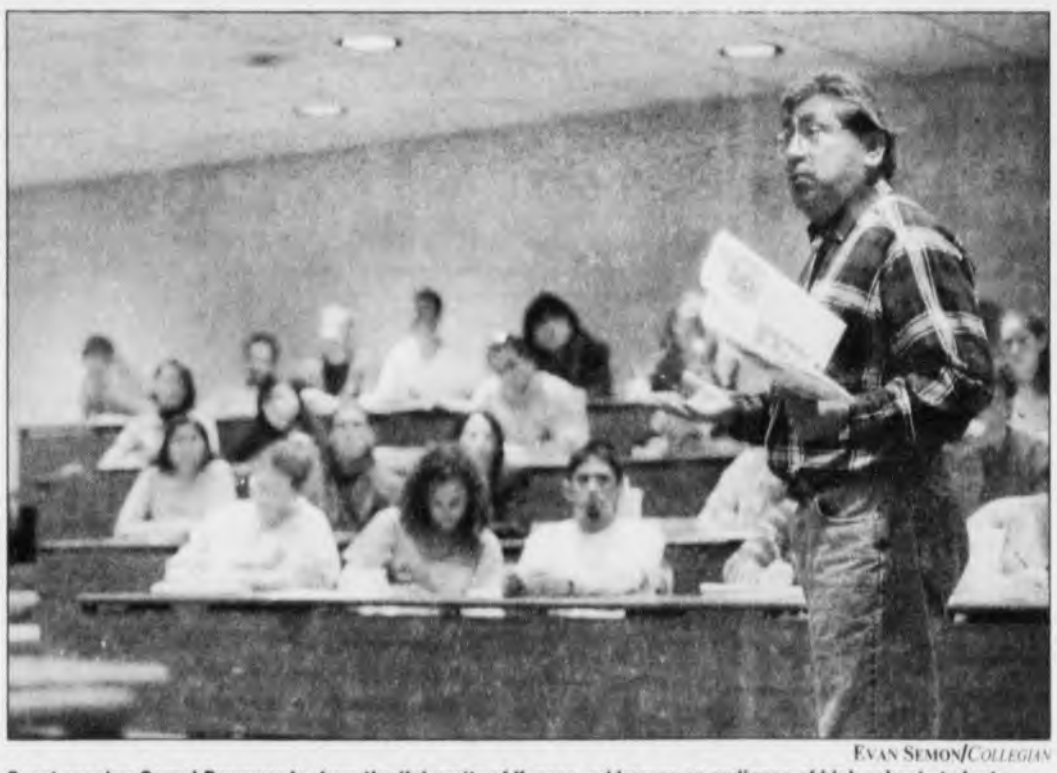
Pewewardy said a misconstrued image is manufactured by Hollywood and the media.

"It's not even close to what's real. It's so incongruent with reality," Pewewardy said. "We need to go out and educate people."

Pewewardy said actions like the tomahawk chop and wooing attempts to emulate tribal music are Hollywood-created themes.

"How would you like to be represented as a mascot?" he asked. "The critical masses of the American population need to rethink these issues of how they're honoring us. It's all images that have been Hollywood created."

Manhattan High has used an Indian for a mascot since 1940. The Indian was adopted over other ideas like the blue dragon and wolverine.



Since its adoption, at Manhattan High, the American Indian has not been used derogatorily in any way, said Melvin Dale, 1954 Manhattan High School graduate.

"If anybody dared speak poorly of our mascot, they lost teeth," he said. "I have absolutely no problem with it."

Tonya Anderson, student body officer at Manhattan High School, said students today only regard the mascot with respect.

"We do take it as a symbol of pride," she said.

Manhattan High is not immune to cultural changes and the push for eradicating negative images of an American Indian mascot.

EVAN SEMON/COLLEGIAN

Guest speaker Cornel Pewewardy, from the University of Kansas, addresses an audience of high school students, school board members, college students and patrons. Pewewardy spoke on the issue of the American Indian being used as a mascot for sports teams.

Sylvester Benson, Manhattan High principal, said reforms were made in 1992 to ensure the mascot would not place American Indians in a negative light.

Benson said the mascot wearing a headdress would not be allowed at games. An American Indian art teacher at Manhattan High designed an appropriate logo of an American Indian that now is used to represent the school's mascot.

Tammy Goodson, president of the K-State Native American Student Body, said she views Manhattan High's American Indian mascot differently than the students do. She said after recently moving here from Oklahoma, she thought she saw an article about American Indians when she opened the paper and saw a headline about the tribe. She said she was disappointed to discover it was the sports page, and the tribe that the headline referred to was the football team.

"Manhattan High School is using my people as their mascot. You wouldn't have Manhattan Negroes. It just wouldn't happen," she said. "No other race would be used as a mascot. It's been going on so long, though, that it's OK."

Pewewardy said across the country, certain changes are occurring to combat the misleading stereotypes portrayed by American Indians as mascots. He said editors of newspapers such as The Seattle Times are making policies that ban harsh words describing American Indians. For example, he said the Washington Redskins are more commonly referred to as the Washington professional football team.

Pewewardy said rather than using a mascot to honor American Indians, a more effective means of respect toward American Indians would be to alter school curriculum to include more American Indian education.

Awareness and using education as a tool is key in bringing attention to America, Pewewardy said.

"Education is starting to penetrate mainstream America," he said. "More and more people are becoming educated to these issues."

Country singer Dustin Evans to perform at Silverado Saloon

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A week long party will end with country band Dustin Evans and Good Times performing at the Silverado Saloon tonight.

Jeff Fellows, concert promoter for Silverado, said Evans and his band will be the headliner for a week long kick off party prior the K-State vs. Colorado football game Saturday.

He said the band came to Manhattan last year and performed for the K-State vs. Nebraska kick off party, and because of its success, Fellows said Silverado decided to do the same type of event again this year.

"Evans is a local favorite, and he always pleases the crowd," Fellows said. "He mixes his performance with rock-and-roll and country so it appeals to all audiences, whether there are college students or older people present."

Fellows said doors will open at 7 p.m. , and Evans will perform from 9:30 p.m. to 1:45 a.m. Tickets are $5, and people will be allowed in until the bar reaches capacity.

Greg Gilman, owner of Silverado, said his suggestion is to get to the bar early in order to be allowed entry to see the concert.

"Evans has a broad audience because he appeals to fans in general," Gilman said. "However, once we hit occupancy, that's it, so people should get here early."

Fellows said that throughout the week, there have been activities leading to the football game this weekend. On Tuesday night, Draw the Line, the No. 1 Aerosmith-endorsed band performed; Wednesday night featured $1 night, and Friday and Saturday there will be the typical football game promotions.

Evans' strong local support has come from performing at the Country Stampede in both 1998 and 1999. Both years, he opened for bands on the main stage and performed at the Longhorn's Bar and Grill tent between acts.

Gilman said because of the publicity Evans has received through his Stampede appearances, he has obtained a good following from those in Manhattan and the surrounding areas.

"I have seen him at Stampede, and he puts on a great show," Gilman said. "He has the ability to respond to hard-core country music fans as well as others who may not like country music all that well."

Bald eagle to be taken off endangered list

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GREAT BEND, Kan. — A decision to remove the bald eagle from the state list of endangered species is meeting with mixed responses.

Some say upgrading the bird's status to threatened signifies a success for the conservation programs that pulled the bald eagle from the brink of extinction.

Others are concerned that the change, which takes effect Nov. 26, could lead to the end of programs that helped save the national symbol.

"It doesn't mean we've solved the problem—it means we've figured out what the problem is," said Alison Reber, president of the Jayhawk Audubon Society in Lawrence.

The decision came Thursday at a meeting of the Kansas Wildlife and Parks Commission in Great Bend. Clint Riley, the department's general counsel, said the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service already has taken similar action at the federal level.

If the federal government completely de-lists the bald eagle next summer, as has been proposed, Riley said it almost is certain the state will consider similar action.

When a species is listed as either threatened or endangered, the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks has authority to regulate any activity or development that could threaten critical habitat of the species.

Fraternities deserve to shatter stereotype

Men aren't joining fraternities to drink themselves into an alcoholic stupor every night. At least, that's what new evidence suggests. Since houses started going dry, or not allowing alcohol in the houses, recruitment numbers haven't been hindered.

That's good news for fraternity members trying to shatter the stereotype that fraternity men are drunks. It's also good news for the houses at K-State scheduled to go dry in the next few years. Four K-State fraternities are dry and three more will follow in the next two years. None of the sororities at K-State allow alcohol in their houses.

There still is room for improvement, however. Most dry fraternities still allow alcohol at out-of-house events, although FarmHouse doesn't. Twenty K-State fraternities have no plans to go dry. With the recent rash of binge-drinking incident deaths in fraternities, safety should be the No. 1 concern.

The dry fraternities should be commended for their efforts. Fraternities that aren't dry and have no immediate plans to become that way for fear of losing numbers seriously should think about the option. It is a positive decision that defeats the stereotype that fraternities are more about drinking than brotherhood.

I am independent, and I thought I had nothing against the greeks. But if all of you are like the guy who called in and said they are better than me, better looking and we are idiots, I might change my mind.

Greeks, everyone likes a good tailgate party, but it's a better thing to go in and support the team.

The comments that the greeks make in the Fourum makes it look so bad for the rest of the greeks that aren't like them. Greeks end up coming across as ignorant, and it's just obvious why some people don't want to join them.

Before reading yesterday's Fourum, I thought all the greek talk was stereotyping, but now I hate greeks more than just about everybody.

Each second eternity when test propped on toilet-paper roll determines future

ERIN SCHNEWEIS

My friend's future was based on a test sitting on a toilet-paper roll.

The results had the possibility of affecting her not only for the next nine months, but for the rest of her life.

It was more than a year ago when my friend confided her secret to me. Her period was late, and she had the woman's instinct that told her she was pregnant.

After purchasing a pregnancy test, she came to my residence hall room to find out if she was expecting. She wanted to know if she was expecting a baby, a life changed and a series of choices she would have to make.

After taking the test, she left it sitting in my bathroom.

Thirty seconds of silence went by. What can you say to someone whose life either would go back to being normal or change forever in a matter of minutes?

Tick. Tick. Tick.

She asked me to go see if I could tell anything.

I dreaded going into the bathroom.

After glancing at the test, my eyes filled up with tears. In the small window, there was already a hint of a plus sign. When I came out of the bathroom, she quickly sat up on my bed.

"Can you tell?" she asked me.

"It is too early," I said.

Tick. Tick. Tick.

The seconds seemed to drag. Two additional times she had me go into the bathroom and check the test. With every "look," it was apparent she was pregnant.

I kept telling her the time wasn't up yet.

The test took two minutes. They were the longest two minutes of my life.

Tick. Tick. Tick.

Finally, time was up.

Alone, she walked into the bathroom. For more than a minute, I heard silence.

Tick. Tick. Tick.

Then I heard a soft sob. It was a sob that could be mistaken for either laughter or sorrow. The sob grew louder. It drowned out the clock.

Slowly, she walked out of the bathroom and went into my arms. She didn't have to say anything. Her body was shaking uncontrollably. Together we cried. I held my 18-year-old friend because she was still a child herself.

I looked at her and tried to comfort her.

This was the girl I used to play little-league softball with, the friend I had laughed and cried with and the girl I watched grow up.

Now she was pregnant.

When she told her boyfriend, he said he would stand by her side and support her choice to give the baby up for adoption. He said he would be there holding her hand in the delivery room.

Within two days he was gone. He didn't just leave town. He left her. He left their baby that she carried in her womb.

For the next nine months, she gave up the occasional drinking and smoking. She gave up going to parties and living the typical college life.

At the beginning of the ninth month, she gave up her baby.

She gave a present, the gift of a new life, to strangers.

But she was given the gift of some hard lessons that included the fact that men are alike in their promises but different in their deeds.

It was a lesson that spanned past the pregnancy, past the strength and fear she encountered. It was a lesson that no class, no teacher, no test can prepare anyone for.

I learned things as well. I learned sometimes it takes two to tango, but sometimes there is only one person left to dance.

Above all, I learned how your future can be determined by a test propped up on a roll of toilet paper.

Radio shows bad, but local news even more painful to watch

TRAVIS D. LENKNER

A sentence or two in the 22nd paragraph of last week's column has touched off a bit of a controversy.

It seems Manhattan's banal morning-show personalities didn't take kindly to my observation that there aren't any good morning-radio hosts in the Manhattan area.

Many of the disc jockeys chose to talk about my column on their mostly horrible shows. In fact, my Collegian writing still is getting air time. (As if we needed an indication of how topic-starved these shows can be.)

I spent time Wednesday as a guest host on KXBZ-FM 104.7. It was fun, and the hosts there are pretty nice folks, but even their listeners can't decide who's right. According to my unofficial count, calls from listeners who loved/hated the two disc jockeys were split 50/50.

I'll stick to my guns on this topic. With few exceptions, Manhattan radio in the morning is pretty awful.

Why make a big stink out of nothing? Let's make a big stink out of something that's so God-awful I can't believe people aren't dying as a result: local TV news.

It is impossible to hate anything more than I hate TV news in this area — categorically the most horrible programming you ever will be forced to suffer through.

Forget the weekend anchors, the part-time meteorologists and the prop-my-eye-open-with-a-toothpick-or-just-gouge-it-out Sunday-morning public-affairs shows that air on local channels. Each of those topics could be a separate column.

Instead, just take the horrible news anchors and wannabe reporters who make their starts in Topeka or better yet, Junction City. Think long and hard about the news you sit through each night as you wait for an inaccurate forecast or sport scores without typos.

Announcer: "Tonight, on the world leader in Topeka news: 10 great stories in three minutes, plus the world's most accurate Shawnee County super-doppleriffic forecast. Stay tuned. Tonight's news starts right now!"

That's quite a lead-in. And it only gets better.

We're stuck with anchors who couldn't anchor a picture to the wall, much less keep a 30-minute show from spiraling into a poorly engineered "Nightmare on Fairlawn Road, Part IV."

The local story starts with a little flair. "Let's see what the City Council's doing tonight." Hmm. That sounds interesting ... until the reporter only manages to confuse the issue instead of explain it.

Reporter: "Well, Ted, the council is down here tonight, uh, voting on a major development project for this neighborhood. And the neighbors are quite upset. Neighborhood resident Charlie Smith has been at the meeting with other neighbors for the past four hours, and he said the neighborhood development project won't be good for his neighborhood."

Charlie: "I can't believe the council would consider this development project. We're fighting to save our neighborhood from handguns and Limp Bizkit. Just last week I caught a boy playing Pokemon on my front lawn! The last thing we need is development."

Reporter: "As you can see, Ted, this neighborhood development project is a divisive issue, and one that is certain to plague the council for weeks to come."

Anchor: "Hmm. A good story, Julie. I'm sure that will be a tough decision for the council."

But while these stories might be terrible, they're current. Be sure to stay tuned, because midway through the newscast, it's time for health news. That's when anchors take the health story they read last week and read it again to scare you into dying or buying services from the local hospital or medical office, which probably sponsors the closed captioning on the news so that even the deaf people among us can be subjected to terrible television.

There are other great features, like the "roving backyard party." That's when the weatherman calls your house, invites himself over and gorges on hamburgers and Aunt Patty's pickle relish until it's time to spout the latest 200-day long-term outlook that really isn't accurate past noon tomorrow.

The sportscasting and so-called analysis is surface, at best. To call the engineering and camera work "shoddy" is a compliment. The graphics are either too old and hard to read or they're too new. Being "first in digital television" doesn't mean a hoot when no one has a digital television and the digital graphics are digitally so hard to look at that your eyes are digitally sore.

Don't take me zooming through the nationwide forecast. I need Dramamine and a nap after flying through North Carolina and down the East Coast.

Don't take a picture of your dog and then use it to "predict" the outcome of football games. I know who's picking. It's the stupid sports guy, not his stupid dog.

Finally, don't fill the 30-minute time slot with incredible stories like "how the fire department works" or "why the latest non-profit organization needs your help." A five-minute community calendar could easily replace the standard news lineup.

Three cheers to local TV news people. Your broadcasts make me hit my stereo's "on" button for something that's slightly less painful.

I thank you — and all of Manhattan's radio personalities do, too.

McKinney convicted of murder in gay-attack case, eligible for death penalty

BY MEAD GRUVER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LARAMIE, Wyo. — A drug-dealing roofer was convicted Wednesday of murder in the beating of a gay college student, making him eligible for the death sentence for a slaying so brutal it spurred calls for hate-crime laws around the nation.

In addition to felony murder, Aaron McKinney was convicted of second-degree murder, aggravated robbery and kidnapping in the death of Matthew Shepard. The jury of seven men and five women returned the verdicts after about 10 hours of deliberation. The jurors, however, rejected a first-degree murder charge that McKinney had planned the attack.

The sentencing phase, where the jurors will consider the death penalty, is to begin today.

As the jury prepared to announce its verdict, McKinney, 22, stood next to his two attorneys, looking impassive, arms crossed in front of him. When the first verdict was read — guilty of kidnapping — his arms dropped to his sides. His father, William, looked straight ahead with no emotion.

Shepard, 21, a University of Wyoming freshman majoring in political science, met McKinney and Russell Henderson at a Laramie bar on Oct. 6, 1998.

Prosecutors said McKinney and Henderson lured Shepard from the bar and drove him to a remote spot on the prairie, where they tied him to a wooden rail fence, robbed him of $20 and pistol-whipped him into a coma.

Eighteen hours later, Shepard, bruised and bleeding, was found still lashed to the fence. He died five days later at a Fort Collins, Colo., hospital without regaining consciousness.

Shepard's death sparked vigils around the country denouncing the murder as a hate crime and renewed efforts for laws protecting homosexuals from such crimes.

Authorities said robbery was the primary motive but that the slightly built Shepard also was singled out because he was gay.

Henderson pleaded guilty in April to kidnapping and murder, and is serving two life sentences.

In closing arguments Tuesday, prosecutor Cal Rerucha paused for 60 seconds to let the jury reflect in silence on the beating inflicted on Shepard.

"Think what 60 seconds was to Matthew Shepard," Rerucha said. "It's a short time if you're eating an ice cream cone. It's a long time if you're descending into hell not knowing what fate will meet you there."

Defense attorneys argued that McKinney, in a drug-induced rage, lost control after Shepard made an unwanted sexual advance.

They were barred from using a gay panic strategy, which is based on the theory that a person with latent gay tendencies will have an uncontrollable, violent reaction when propositioned by a homosexual.

District Judge Barton Voigt ruled the strategy was akin to temporary insanity or a diminished-capacity defense — both prohibited under Wyoming law. The ruling essentially let the defense argue the beating was a crime of passion but not present the theory that the passion was caused by a specific mental condition.

In his closing argument, public defender Dion Custis told the jury that McKinney was in an "emotional rage."

"(He) is not a cold-blooded murderer, ladies and gentlemen — he reacted," Custis said. "There was no thought process."

Shepard's death sparked vigils around the country denouncing the murder as a hate crime and renewed efforts for laws protecting homosexuals from such crimes.

In Wyoming's Legislature, however, proposed hate-crime bills failed. Opponents said gays and other protected groups would get special treatment and argued existing laws are enough. President Clinton's push to expand federal hate crime legislation to protect gays also fell short.

Shepard went to high school in Switzerland, spoke three languages and had traveled the world before returning to his native Wyoming to attend the university.

He was raised in a close, loving family made comfortable by his father's job in a multinational oil company.

Community-college transfer brings list of surprises to team

VIEWPOINT

SARAH CRAIG

April Sailors has made a career of surprises. Sailors, a community-college transfer from Trinity Valley Junior College, joins the women's basketball team this season after playing for the NJCAA National Champions last year.

Sailors is only 5 feet 5 inches tall. She heard, time and time again, that she wasn't tall enough to play.

Here comes surprise No. 1: Sailors didn't listen. She started playing basketball in fifth grade for a Salvation Army league and never stopped.

Sailors, sophomore in social sciences, found success in high school, leading her team to Nebraska's Class B state title as a senior and earning all-state team rankings her final three years. There was another surprise to come, a few weeks before most athletes were signing with schools, Sailors didn't know where she was going to go.

So she sent a tape to Trinity Valley and surprised it too, enough that after a few scrimmages with the team, she signed with it.

Sailors said sometimes she felt coaches didn't sign her because of her height, but she didn't let it get to her. She just kept playing.

She played so well that she helped her team to an undefeated season and an NJCAA title. Never mind the fact that most people told her she would never play Division I ball.

There were more surprises in store.

For K-State coach Deb Patterson, the surprise was that associate head coach Kamie Ethridge liked Sailors.

"When I saw April for the first time, Coach Ethridge had made an initial evaluation of April," Patterson said. "When Coach Ethridge likes a point guard, I just about drop down and die of a heart attack because her standards are so high for point guards, having been one.

"She came back and said, 'Listen, there's a point guard up there that can really play, and I really like this kid,' so I went to watch April with a positive attitude and really not with a great deal of anxiety."

For the rest of the coaches who had seen Sailors play, the surprise was that she was going to sign with a Division I team. But Sailors had never listened to them.

So now K-State can sit back and wonder what kind of surprises Sailors has left in store. Don't expect it to be dull. Sailors has proven her abilities on the court, averaging 9.6 points, 5.5 assists, and three steals per game her second year at Trinity. And for a point guard with no Division I experience, we can only expect these numbers to get better.

Sailors might even surprise herself —Patterson said she expects Sailors to expand her game. Having played with four All-American caliber athletes at community college, Sailors didn't carry as much weight as Patterson expects her to here.

"April has really been challenged some days," Patterson said. "There's things that we're doing very different, but she's answering the call. I love the fact that she's a team player."

Sailors' career has been one of challenges, having chosen a sport with so much emphasis on height. But she has surprised many — in fact, she likes the challenge.

Wildcat fans can expect a surprising show from Sailors on any given night. She forces her team to play a running game and makes things happen with no-look passes and plays that surprise her teammates.

"April's doing awesome," senior center Angie Finkes said. "We have a hard program to learn, and she's picked up on it really quick. She likes to run it. That's the best. We've gotten to get the ball up the floor a little more and see what it's like to just run a play and not really call it."

The key to Sailors is not in the plays she makes, but in the fact that she surprises everyone. She did so with a very competitive mind-set that will not die this season and will provide a show for the crowd.

"I hate to lose, I think that's the whole competitive nature, and not just in basketball but everywhere," Sailors said. "I just have that thing where you never give up, you're always moving forward, and that's the whole thing I got out of high school and junior college, you're always moving forward."

And no one can really predict what will happen as she does.

Colorado's Shana Bowen (center) celebrates Wednesday night with the rest of the Buffaloes after their come-from-behind upset victory of the No. 17 Wildcats at Ahearn Field House. This extends the Wildcats' losing streak to three matches and drops their record to 15-6, 9-4 in the Big 12.

K-State volleyball team drops final 3 games to Colorado to extend Big 12 losing streak to 3 matches

BY IVAN KOZAR
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 17 K-State volleyball team faltered in the last three games of their match Wednesday night to hand the No. 20 Colorado Buffaloes their sixth win in conference play,

After cruising to victories in the first two games of the match in Ahearn Field House, the Cats lost the next three to extend their losing streak to three straight matches.

In the first game of the evening, the Cats (15-6, 9-4) came out determined and jumped to a 6-1 lead on the Buffaloes (14-8, 8-6).

Outside hitters Dawn Cady and Liz Wegner both racked up five kills, helping the Cats cruise to a 15-8 win in game one.

Game two was another lopsided battle as the Cats jumped up on the Buffaloes 13-1 and ended the match with a 15-5 victory.

"We came out and played some really good volleyball," head coach Jim McLaughlin said. "We kept the pressure on them — then all of a sudden we changed."

After intermission, the Cats started game three as they did in games one and two, going up 4-0 before the Buffaloes put a point on the board.

With the score tied at nine, Colorado took the lead and never looked back, as they ended game three with a score of 15-11.

"Looking at the match and being down two-nothing on the road," Colorado head coach Pi'i Aiu said, "the fact that we can win is great for our young team.

"It's a learning process. It's a process they need to go through to take the step to be a better team."

After winning game three, the Buffaloes came out in game four and went to a 7-1 lead before the Cats scratched their way to a 11-11 tie on a kill by Cady.

The Buffaloes' defense, however, was too much for the Cats, as they won 15-12, bringing a final game to the table.

"The first two games we were really good, and then our passing changed and our distribution changed," McLaughlin said.

Game five saw seven different ties in a back-and-forth battle won by the Buffaloes 16-14 on a lifted hit by outside hitter Lindsay Kenney.

"I didn't like our matchups. They did a good job," McLaughlin said. "They passed well in the last game, and we didn't."

The Cats look to break their three-game losing streak Saturday as they face Iowa State in Ames, Iowa.

Lisa Mimick responds as Julie Thomas comes up just short while diving to dig a Colorado spike in the third game of K-State's match in Ahearn Field House Wednesday night. The Wildcats won the first two games only to see the Buffaloes come back and win the next three games to win the match.

K-State tennis team travels to Utah for qualifying tournament

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Wildcat tennis squad traveled to Salt Lake City to compete in today's opening round action of the Intercollegiate Tennis Association's (ITA) Rolex Regional Championships.

Utah's Eccles Center is one of six regional tennis sites across the nation, with each team battling to qualify for the Rolex National Indoor Tournament in Dallas later this fall.

The two finalists from each regional singles draw both receive invitations to nationals, as well as the doubles champion from each region.

This year, the Wildcats sent four women to compete in the Regional Tournament, which runs through Sunday: junior and No. 73-ranked Anna Pampoulova, junior Eva Novotna', sophomore Alena Jecminkova and freshman Petra Sedlmajerova.

Singles action begin at 8 a.m. Semifinals are scheduled for Saturday, while the finals are set for Sunday, both at 9 a.m.

Pampoulova and Jecminkova will also pair up in doubles action as will the tandem of Novotna' and Sedlmajerova.

Steve Bietau, in his 16th season as K-State head tennis coach, said he hopes the doubles squads will use last weekend's Wildcat Doubles Invitational as a positive in the regional competition.

"They need to build on what they learned there," Bietau said.

Doubles play begins at 6 this evening. Both the semifinals and finals are set for Sunday at noon.

Bietau said the team will need to play its best in order to compete well in a talented field of tennis.

"We have to play as well as we possibly can," Bietau said. "The thing I look for in terms of the team is how many do well. We need a more consistent performance."

"I'd rather have four players in the quarterfinals than have one win the tournament."

Salt Lake City features a field of 23 Division I-A tennis programs in the region, eight of whom are ranked, including No. 24 New Mexico, No. 32 Colorado, and No. 40 Kansas.

The singles bracket will be a 64-draw and the doubles a 48-draw.

The tournament has a consolation bracket for first-round losers, guaranteeing each participant at least two matches.

Any loss after the first round, however, eliminates them from the tournament.

Sophomore standout starts season with 2 wins in singles competition

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sophomore phenom Alena Jecminkova is playing perhaps the best tennis of her career.

"I think her start of the year has been pretty exciting," head coach Steve Bietau said. "I'm not at all surprised she could play this well."

JECMINKOVA

Jecminkova, native of Libusina, Czech Republic, already has won both flight-two singles tournaments she has competed in this fall.

In the opening tournament of the season on Oct. 10, Jecminkova won the Tulsa Hurricane Invitational in Tulsa, Okla.

She captured the singles title Oct. 17 in the Indiana Hoosier Classic in Bloomington, Ind.

"I think these tournaments are one of best of my career," she said. "I think I'm pretty happy about it."

At the Indiana tournament, Jecminkova paired with junior Anna Pampoulova to win the consolation doubles championship.

"I think we can make a pretty good doubles team," Jecminkova said. "Anna is the kind of person that encourages me and supports me."

Bietau agreed the duo has great potential to succeed this season.

"I think they can be a great team, there's no doubt about it," he said. "Alena and Anna can complement each other very well because of their different styles of play. With that type of atmosphere, there's no doubt they can be a great doubles combination."

The duo also added a tie for second place in the Wildcat Doubles Invitational last weekend to their list of achievements this fall.

Jecminkova has made big strides from last year. She was sidelined due to injury for much of last season, only compiling four singles victories in all of 1998-99.

Last fall, Jecminkova had ankle surgery and missed all of the fall tournaments. In the spring, back problems hindered her performance on the court.

"I was very unhappy about my health situation last year," she said. "This year, my ankle is almost OK, but my back is still hurting me. I'm just trying to handle it. I think it's getting better."

Bietau, too, said he sees positive improvements from last year.

"I think there's a physical part and a mental part to it, and I think she's made progress in both areas," he said.

THURSDAY'S health question

Q: Does stress really cause students to drink more?

A: "Studies indicate that people drink as a means of coping with economic stress, job stress and marital problems, often in the absence of social support, and that the more severe and chronic the stressor, the greater the alcohol consumption," according to the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism. "However, whether an individual will drink in response to stress appears to depend on many factors, including possible genetic determinants of drinking in response to stress, an individual's usual drinking behavior, one's expectations regarding the effect of alcohol on stress, the intensity and type of stressor, the individual's sense of control over the stressor, the range of one's responses to cope with the perceived stress, and the availability of social support to buffer the effects of stress."

HELP available

Office of Student Life helps students during sickness

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE

The last thing students want to think about during a family emergency or the onset of a serious illness is handling classes.

However, in the event of an emergency, the Office of Student Life is able to help reduce the stress involved with the situation.

Carla Jones, associate dean of student life, said students should come to the Office of Student Life, Holton 102, and their academic worries will be in the hands of the staff.

"Sometimes students will come here, and we'll direct them to their college," she said. "Then, someone in their college will notify the student's professors if they're going to be gone for an extended period of time."

Jones said that while many instructors and professors list on their syllabi at the beginning of the semester what to do in the case of the emergency, these steps are not required.

Students must be absent for at least five days for their college to write a letter to their professors, Jones also said.

There are many different aspects that can affect a student's absence and how the situation is handled.

"If a student is absent because of an illness, it depends on how quickly they are able to get over the illness," Jones said. "Each college handles things differently. It just depends on their policies."

However, a student might have more problems than getting caught up in classes, Jones said.

"If it's a family emergency and they take longer to get back to school, they may have some concentration problems, and the student may be referred to counseling," Jones said. "They might need to talk about these situations. There's more issues than just getting them to the right phone number."

This is where University Counseling Services comes in.

Elisabeth Sundermeier, a counselor with University Counseling Services, said it is common for students to return to school following a family illness or death and need counseling. Many students need this help in order to get back on track with their studies.

"For these situations, we have individual counseling available," Sundermeier said. "If the student is in a stage of shock or denial, it can be really distracting when they're trying to deal with the rest of their life at the same time."

Sundermeier said each person deals with these emergencies in different ways, and regardless of how they do so, students are assured to receive assistance in getting their lives back in order.

"It all depends on the person's individual needs and, if necessary, we'll point you toward support for the academic side and catching up on things," she said.

Backpacks, poor posture can put students on road to injury

BY JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lugging around a loaded backpack for hours on end while jogging from class to class isn't easy on the back and shoulders.

In fact, there are many common mistakes students make that could lead to injuries.

"Ninety percent of the problems I get from students are from poor posture," said Dr. David Carver of Manhattan Chiropractic.

"If it lasts more than a day, you need to seek help. The attitude that it will get better on its own could lead to further injury."
— Dr. David Carver, Manhattan Chiropractic

Carver said pain stems from things such as the manner in which backpacks are carried to the the way in which students sit in class or study.

"When you're sitting in class, you shouldn't be slumped over the desk, or over to the side, because it changes the posture in the back muscles. Sitting like that for an hour or more, it develops more strain on the back or neck," Carver said. "Sitting while slouched over a book, or reading a book on the couch with your neck angled, is also going to cause strain."

Spending extended periods of time stooped in front of a computer screen is also a bad habit, said Dr. John Wheeler of the Chiropractic Family Health Center.

"Students that are sitting primarily in front of a computer throughout the day, it makes them vulnerable to back injuries," Wheeler said. "Carrying heavy backpacks can only aggravate injuries."

Remembering to sit up straight, even through longer lecture classes, is an important step to improving posture and preventing muscle strain, he said.

One way to help distribute the weight of an overloaded backpack could be the benefit of a waist strap, a feature of many hiking packs.

"That would probably help some, because it centers the weight, and would benefit you as far as posture," Carver said. "There's also the extra security, and the strap would make things more comfortable."

When a student suffers a sudden injury, whether from bending, lifting or twisting, there are certain signs that will determine its seriousness.

"When a patient that has pain extending from the lower back into your knees or that goes into the leg, it's the sign of a more serious condition," Wheeler said.

To prevent strain and injuries in the first place, being physically fit in the first place is a plus, Wheeler said.

"One important thing is good health," he said. "An aerobic exercise program and brisk walking can help muscle tone."

Keeping limber also can prevent sudden shocks to muscles and help the body get used to lifting heavy loads of books. Wheeler said flexibility is an important aspect of lower back health.

If students are hoping to end the pain on their own, there are a few important tips to remember.

"Don't put heat on an injury, because you will make it 10 times worse, especially in the first 72 hours," Wheeler said. "Apply ice to the area, since it will help keep inflammation to a minimum."

Making an appointment with a chiropractor shouldn't be a later step when dealing with back injuries, Wheeler said.

"Chiropractors help restore function to spinal joints that are locked up or not moving correctly," Wheeler said. "They help normalize spinal function and speed the healing process."

Both doctors urged that back pain sufferers shouldn't hesitate to seek professional help once the aching becomes bothersome.

"If it lasts more than a day, you need to seek help," Carver said. "The attitude that it will get better on its own could lead to further injury. If they would seek help on the second or third day that the pain persists, they will be far better off."

Rose said he disagrees.

"The laws are tough enough and the number of voters are big enough that there will not be recall after recall after recall," he said.

Rose said the only upcoming plan the recall committee has is a radio spot on Nov. 23 from 6 to 7 p.m. on KMAN-AM 1350. He said it has other plans, but they haven't been worked out yet.

A local committee, Citizens for Sensible Government, is helping with McCulloh's campaign.

Glenn Busset, treasurer of Citizens for Sensible Government and professor emeritus, said its philosophy is to stop the recall.

"We are just a bunch of people that feel our city government is going in the wrong direction when some can come in with a complaint and get a person like Karen McCulloh thrown out on a whim," Busset said.

Busset said besides raising money for McCulloh's campaign, they are encouraging people to vote.

"We are going to try to get a large number out," he said.

McCulloh said she can't predict how many people will vote, but she is concerned about the timing of the election.

"This is a brand new thing. It's a bad time of year. Its going to be cold, " she said. "People are going to be very busy from Thanksgiving to Christmas."

She said if a lot of people turn out, then she will be in good shape.

Rose said most of the people who do go out and vote will probably be those who feel strongly one way.

"I question if it will be a real heavy vote," Rose said. "It's the only question of the ballot."

But he said it will be well watched.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said this election is very important to the community and doesn't think this issue warrants a recall election.

"It has the possibility to be very chilling on the community if Karen is recalled in terms of the current elected officials and persons who want to serve the community as elected officials," Snead said.

Rose said he thinks the recall petition has increased more interest in local government.

"I think more people are interested in the government at this time than have been for years," Rose said.

Both Snead and Carol Peak voted to remove the monolith with McCulloh but were not eligible to be recalled since they had not been in office the required 120 days. They were elected last April.

Because the 120 day period is now up, Vargo said they are now eligible.

Snead said he is not worried about being recalled.

"I am not fearful of it, but that is a possibility," he said. "That is not something I can control."

Rose said the committee is waiting for the results of this election before they decide if they want to petition to recall for Snead or Peak.

"There's no sense in doing anything until this recall vote is over," he said.

COST

the city will have less to spend if something comes up later.

"If anything else comes up, we will have to take it under serious consideration whether to fund it this year or to carry it over to the next year," Doan said.

Donald Rose, member of the recall committee, said he thinks the price is worth it.

"I do not object to my money being used for a recall election," he said.

But he said he did object when the city commission voted on Sept. 7 to pay $12,000 to settle the lawsuit against the city for having the Ten Commandments monolith on city property.

He said the recall committee is taking the only course they know of.

"If there was a more reasonable way to do it, we would do it," Rose said.

Lou Heaton, recall committee treasurer and K-State associate professor, said their committee has raised very little money and has spent very little. He said they only have raised a couple hundred dollars.

Most of the money they have raised has gone to cover some of the legal fees associated with the recall process, he said.

Heaton said he thinks the price of the election to the city is insignificant when considering the right to petition the government is outlined in the First Amendment.

"The cost cannot be a huge concern when we're talking about obtaining access to the government," he said.

Citizens for Sensible Government, a committee of McCulloh supporters, have spent the last three weeks raising funds for her campaign.

Glenn Busset, committee treasurer and K-State professor emeritus, would not give the total figure they have raised but said they received $200 on Tuesday.

The money will go toward helping with the cost of ad space and yard signs.

"We have raised a lot," he said. "It has been quite successful."

He said they get mail everyday and were surprised by a sizable donation from a person from New York.

"This is the amazing thing. We have gotten donations from people who used to live here," Busset said.

McCulloh said she is angry this election is costing both supporters and the city money.

"I am sure when you tally up, in all directions, we're spending around $50,000," she said. "Monies people might have spent in a more positive way."

TENNIS

Looking at the problems health posed last year, Jecminkova said team morale is the key to success this season.

"I think the most important thing now is health," she said. "I hope I can stay healthy so I can improve my game. I also hope that the rest of the team will stay healthy, too, so we can compete well."

This fall, Jecminkova posts an undefeated singles record and has compiled a career-high six singles victories. However, she said that no one has seen the best of her yet.

"I know I can play much better," Jecminkova said. "I think I can do more. I can do much more."

Bietau said there is much more to be seen from Jecminkova in the next couple of years.

"Alena is a talented striker of the ball," he said. "She can do things with the tennis ball that a lot of players will never do. There's no question that she'll continue to play better."

As the fall season winds down, Jecminkova said she is pleased with the way she played this season.

"I am pretty satisfied," she said. "I just need to work on conditioning. I think I was more mentally prepared for this season and not as much physically.

"I think our team has worked very hard this fall and practices are pretty good. Everybody is doing what our coach wants us to do."

However, despite her success, Jecminkova doesn't necessarily see herself as being the team leader for the squad quite yet. She said everyone is trying to lead by example.

"I just want to play my best," she said. "For me, it really doesn't matter if I'm the leader or not. I think we support each other pretty well."

However, Bietau said he foresees much potential in Jecminkova in leading the Cat tennis squad in the future.

"I think her playing ability gives her potential for leadership," Bietau said. "But along with ability comes work ethic and being able to produce results consistently over a period of time.

"You have to know how to be successful. And it may take a little bit of time, but because of her ability I think she already has a head start."

Ban of ATM surcharges will not affect Kansas

■ Machines' convenience looked at as worth charge in Kansas, official says.

BY BRYAN SCRIBNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A law passed in San Francisco banning ATM surcharges will not be an issue in Kansas, said Jim Maag, executive vice president of the Kansas Bankers Association.

Maag said Kansas citizens will not seek to ban these $1 to $2 charges because they know ATM use is not mandatory.

"I think most Kansans see it as a convenience issue and know they have access to their own banks," Maag said.

Although most banks in Manhattan charge non-customers for the convenience of ATM access, Dennis Lull, president of UMB bank in Manhattan, said no charges are assessed to their own customers.

"From the bank standpoint, we think it's justifiable to charge the $1 fee to non-customers," Lull said. "I'm sure there are a lot of people who would rather use ATMs at no charge, but there's a lot of expense to operate."

Larry Heyka, president of FirstBank in Manhattan, said that even with a $1.50 charge to non-customers, the bank still loses money.

He said this is due to the costs of installation and maintenance.

"If customers want access, they're going to have to accept the charge," Heyka said. "There's a real cost of doing business."

Lull said if non-customers don't want to pay the fee, they have the choice to cancel their transactions before any exchange takes place.

In addition to the convenience provided to their customers, Lull said ATMs are more cost-effective than traditional tellers.

"Electronic transactions are much cheaper than person-to-person transactions," Lull said.

When ATMs first arrived in about 1975, Maag said Kansas was one of the first states in the United States to allow unrestricted access.

He said Kansas jumped into the operation of these machines, which can be placed almost anywhere, at an early stage.

"An ATM is not considered a branch," said Judi Stork, acting bank commissioner for Kansas. "Basically, if you're a bank, you can put an ATM about anywhere you want."

Maag said about one-third of Kansas banks provide ATMs. When choosing to use an institution's service, Maag said individuals realize it's a convenience that must be paid for.

"The ATM thing has been blown out of proportion," Maag said.

"Any time a city starts restricting what an institution can and can't do, the institutions are not going to continue the service."

With the introduction of surcharges in 1996, the amount of individual companies not associated with banks providing the service greatly increased. Maag said if restrictions are put on these companies, fewer machines will be available.

"ATMs don't grow on trees," Maag said. "They're expensive to put in, and there are costs to run them. The more government restrictions, the less we'll have."

Hutchinson club seeking $1 million for U.S. Women's Open tournament

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A Hutchinson, Kan., country club is planning to ask the state for $1 million to stage the nation's most prestigious women's golf tournament.

Legislators are worried about the possibility of cutting spending on education and social service programs. However, some of them are receptive to the request from the Prairie Dunes Country Club because of the positive publicity the state would get.

The Prairie Dunes course is considered among the best in the world, and it is scheduled to be the site of the 2002 U.S. Women's Open Championship. The event will be televised around the world during the Independence Day weekend.

"It is an opportunity for Kansas to present itself in a very favorable way to the nation," said Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, chairman of the Senate budget committee and a new member of Prairie Dunes. "It's arguably the biggest sporting event in Kansas history."

Still, Kerr told The Topeka Capital-Journal: "It's very difficult timing-wise to bring something like this up now. It's a great political target for anyone who chooses to use it that way."

The state finished its 1999 fiscal year on June 30 with $73.4 million less in revenues than expected. In response, Gov. Bill Graves proposed more than $43 million in cuts in the current budget, with most of the money coming from education and social services.

Legislators fear they'll have to make even deeper cuts during the state's 2001 budget year, which begins July 1, 2000.

of the shipyard on the edge of Lake Union. He had brown curly hair, a mustache and wore a baseball cap and sunglasses.

As the search continued past dark, hours after the morning shooting, Seattle Mayor Paul Schell asked the public to help and to be careful. "Check on your neighbors, check on senior citizens, check on your premises," he said.

Investigators were not ruling out that the suspect fled by boat.

The shooting took place in an industrial area on the edge of the lake, a few blocks from the Wallingford neighborhood, a leafy area of older wood-frame houses with small, tidy yards and porches dotted with Halloween pumpkins.

"We want to alert homeowners as they return for the day, if they see anything unusual, to call 911," Seattle Police Chief Norm Stamper said.

Jeannie Parr, who works in a glassed-in office across the hall from Northlake Shipyard, said she saw the gunman enter the building and thought he looked strange.

"He came in calmly," she told Northwest Cable News. "I didn't hear any sounds of a confrontation or argument. ... All I heard was gunshots."

Scottie Pierce of Seattle Boat, across the street from the shipyard building, said he was sending his employees home early.

"It's almost a surreal-type situation, faced with what the nation went through in Hawaii yesterday," he told the cable station. "I'm quite concerned that there's someone running around with a gun."

Seven people were shot to death Tuesday at a Xerox Corp. building in Honolulu.

The suspected gunman, a Xerox employee, fled after the slayings and surrendered hours later. The shootings follow a string of fatal attacks at workplaces and schools.

President Clinton offered federal help to officials trying to solve both of the latest shootings, and said the country has been plagued for too long with gun violence.

"Our nation continues on this day to be reminded of the horrors of gun violence. We need to do more to keep guns out of the hands of criminals and children," Clinton told reporters in the White House Rose Garden. "Congress needs to send me common-sense (gun) legislation."

honor the athletic department's contract with Pepsi through the year 2005, Schellhardt said.

"We will make a decision as quickly as possible," Schellhardt said, "because it doesn't do any good not to."

When a decision is made, the public will learn how much money the university will gain. The amount of a proposed contract has not been released yet.

It had been reported earlier that a contract would be worth less than what the University of Kansas received because KU's deal includes the entire campus.

KU has a contract with Coca-Cola for 10 years worth about $12 million. The contract included an up-front payment to the university of $7 million. KU receives $450,000 per year in the deal.

K-State's contract proposals include money for university enhancements.

"The impact will be immediate, and it will benefit students, faculty and staff," Schellhardt said. "The negotiations are open, and there hasn't been any decision made."

Schellhardt said a signed contract would bring improvements to the library.

"There would be money for library enhancements and scholarship programs," Schellhardt said. "There is also discussion about a computing commons area probably located in the library."

Schellhardt said it is unclear what enhancements the money allocated to the library would be used for. He said it would be up to a library committee to decide.

Other items remain unclear, such as the cost of soda. The soda machines on campus now charge 55 cents per can.

Schellhardt said there has been some discussions in negotiations about the pricing of soda.

"Our negotiations have included discussions about holding the price down for a certain period of time," Schellhardt said.

As the negotiations continue, the status of Vending Services remains in the air.

Bill Wisdom, head of Vending Services, said he hadn't heard of a decision on Wednesday, and he said the department was continuing to fulfill its responsibilities.

"We are hanging in there," Wisdom said.

Schellhardt said he was comfortable with what the two vendors have said during negotiations regarding Vending services Department.

He said the two companies have expressed concerns about what would be done with Vending Services. The bottom line, Schellhardt said, is that the university still is working on a contract.

"Basically, we are still negotiating," Schellhardt said. "It is of interest and does concern our employees, and it has been a long process."

As the negotiations wind down ,Schellhardt said both vendors have been enthusiastic throughout the process.

"It's been quite enjoyable to talk with the vendors, and they are interested in what K-State provides them," Schellhardt said. "K-State is very popular right now both athletically and academically, and the K-State awareness, that is something both vendors are interested in."

American Greetings purchases rival company for $162 million

BY AMY BETH GRAVES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CLEVELAND — American Greetings is buying Gibson Greetings for about $162 million in a cash deal that unites the second and third largest U.S. greeting card makers behind industry leader, Hallmark.

Under the deal announced Wednesday, American Greetings, based in Cleveland, will pay $10.25 for each of Gibson Greetings' 15.8 million shares, said Morry Weiss, chairman and chief executive officer of American Greetings.

The deal will give American Greetings 36 percent of the U.S. greeting-card market, behind Hallmark's 47 percent, Weiss said.

"Hallmark still does have the lead, but the race isn't over," he said.

The deal still requires regulatory approval.

The company plans to continue to use the Gibson name. Jobs will be cut, mostly in internal operations, but Weiss said he did not know how many. The company expects the acquisition to result in savings of at least $50 million a year.

Weiss also said the company planned to acquire more companies in the near future.

American Greetings has been interested in acquiring Gibson for about five years, but Gibson showed no interest until it suffered an almost year long decline in its stock price, Weiss said.

Gibson shares closed at $5.50 on the Nasdaq stock market Tuesday. The stock was almost $21 a share a year ago.

Frank O'Connell, Gibson chairman and chief executive officer, said the merger "represents the best opportunity for Gibson to enhance shareholder value."

The deal should help American Greetings expand its U.S., international and electronic greeting card business as the company concentrates on restructuring.

This summer, American Greetings announced its planned to eliminate 650 jobs by early next year and close its Canadian greeting cards manufacturing plant and distribution facility.

Founded in 1850, Gibson is the oldest U.S. greeting-card company. It now has revenue of about $220 million. Earnings have dropped because of lost accounts and high operating expenses.

Last year, Gibson eliminated hundreds of jobs and closed its suburban Cincinnati factory.

President Jon Wefald discusses the new contract K-State made with PepsiCo Inc. on Thursday afternoon in the K-State Student Union. The new contract takes effect Jan. 1, 2000.

Pepsi chosen over Coca-Cola as K-State's lone soda vendor

STORY BY NICK BRATKOVIC

Pepsi will be the only choice a generation of K-State students will have on campus for the next decade, beginning Jan. 1, 2000.

The university announced Thursday a 10-year, $12 million contract that will give PepsiCo Inc. exclusive rights to beverages on campus. The deal includes $1 million up front.

"As a member of the state negotiating committee, I am pleased to announce that Kansas State University and Pepsi Cola of Marysville, Kansas, through a state-negotiated bid process, have entered into a 10-year agreement. It is a partnership that gives Pepsi Cola exclusive cola and vending products for a 10-year period," said Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president of administration and finance.

Dan Wassenberg, president of the Pepsi Cola Bottling Co. of Marysville, said the deal is a big opportunity for his company.

"This is a great opportunity for our company. We are a small company, but through the help of the Pepsi Cola Company, we got this deal done," Wassenberg said. "To be a success, I think you have got have that combination. You have to have a good-tasting product, and you've got to have good people."

Students will see a variety of changes, but Schellhardt said there would a moratorium on prices for three years. In the 10 years of the contract, there will be a modest growth in the number of Pepsi machines on campus, and the company has ideas for promotions with K-State.

Hale Library will receive $5 million over the 10-year period as a result of the contract. The money designated to the library would come under the heading of unrestricted funds.

The deal also greatly influences Vending Services. Vending Services will no longer exist after the contract takes effect, but Wassenberg said its employees will have the chance to work with PepsiCo.

"Everybody that works for Vending Services will have the opportunity to work for Pepsi," Wassenberg said. "We will be running routes based out of Manhattan.

"Those people, if they so desire, and want to come to work for Five Star or for Pepsi, they

Library funding, advertising of university among deal's pending benefits

BY BRYAN SCRIBNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The announcement of a 10-year beverage contract between K-State and PepsiCo Inc. has sparked positive responses from some students.

"I like Dr Pepper and that little girl on the Pepsi commercials," said Michelle Lowe, senior in pre-nursing and social science.

David Woodruff, junior in elementary education, said a $5 million allocation to Hale Library is a good reason for the contract.

"Anything toward better student learning is a step in the right direction," Woodruff said.

Woodruff said he is happy with the agreement, but the only concern he has is with the possible commercialization of Pepsi products throughout the campus.

"The only negative thing I'd see is the logos," Woodruff said. "It's OK to see it every once in a while in the Union and library, but not all over."

An indication that Powercat logos, star athletes and scholarship winners possibly will be printed on Pepsi products in the future sounds like a good idea to Morgan Kadel, junior in secondary education.

"It will be a good advertisement for K-State," Kadel said. "We don't usually get as much attention as we should."

Scholarship funding of $2.3 million included in the deal raised concern over what type of students will receive financial aid. Kadel said she would like to see scholarships go to high school students who aren't at the top of their class.

"I would like to see more money go to hard workers with good grades," Kadel said. "Otherwise, there are no other drawbacks. I prefer Pepsi over Coke."

Megan Jack, senior in biology and pre-medicine, said some of the funding should be used for other student organizations.

"It's an OK idea, but we could use it toward other things, like multicultural students," Jack said.

Although Cecelia Dyer, junior in early childhood education, said the financial assistant provided by Pepsi is a good reason for the choice, she said she didn't understand why the contract is important.

"I don't see what the big deal is — it's just a pop," Dyer said. "Then again, they have money."

Seattle gunman remains at large

■ Whereabouts unknown for suspect who killed 2.

BY REBECCA COOK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — Authorities told residents Thursday not to be overly fearful as authorities searched for a camouflaged gunman who killed two employees at a boat-repair shop and wounded two others before vanishing into the city.

The attack, which came one day after a Xerox Corp. employee allegedly shot seven co-workers to death in Hawaii, prompted a massive manhunt Wednesday through leafy streets north of downtown.

The crime appeared to be deliberate and calculated, Police Chief Norm Stamper said. The attacker made no statement to his victims, he said.

"We do not know the identity of the shooter or his whereabouts," the chief said. However, he said the nature of the attack made it unlikely that the killer posed an immediate danger to the neighborhood.

"We are confident that this individual is not a threat to the community as such," he said. "In other words, this is not an individual who is going to repeat the act."

On Wednesday, schools were locked down and residents urged to stay indoors. Schools opened as usual Thursday, Seattle Public Schools spokesman Bill Southern said. No unusual absences were reported.

Stamper said officers had received hundreds of calls and tips. "We have a handful that look pretty good at this point," Stamper said Thursday on NBC's "Today" show.

Police said the gunman walked into the shipyard building before heading directly to a small back office and opening fire.

"He walked in and started shooting. That's all we know," said Pam McCammon, a police spokeswoman. Police said survivors told them the man said nothing before shooting seven to nine rounds with a 9 mm handgun.

A 19-year-old man who survived with a gunshot wound in his arm told police the gunman didn't work at the shop and he had never seen him before. The man was described as possibly in his 30s, with brown hair and wearing an overcoat, camouflage clothing, a baseball cap and sunglasses.

Late Wednesday, authorities detained a man in nearby Tacoma who matched the description. He was released after about an hour.

The shooting happened in an industrial area on the edge of Lake Union, a few blocks from the Wallingford neighborhood, a popular area of older wood-frame houses with small yards and porches dotted with Halloween pumpkins.

As night fell, Mayor Paul Schell asked the public to be careful. "Check on your neighbors, check on senior citizens, check on your premises," he said.

The King County medical examiner's office identified the dead as Russell J. Brisendine, 43, and Peter Giles, 27. Brisendine was a marine engineer who worked on boats'

College dropouts no longer exempt from repaying Pell Grants

BY LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four million students receiving financial aid will have to stay in school, or they'll have to repay their Federal Pell Grants next year.

A new policy from the U.S. Department of Education says students who drop out of college will have to give back a portion of their grant money.

Pell grants are given to students with academic promise but little financial support. The grants formerly were like gifts; students didn't have to pay any of the money back.

Larry Moeder, director of admissions and student financial assistance, said there are 4,014 students at K-State who received Pell grants for the 1999-2000 school year, but that number could rise because students can apply for a Pell grant at any time. For the entire 1998-1999 school year, 4,863 students received Pell grants.

Moeder said the new rule would affect only students who totally drop out of the university, not those who just drop a course. He said the number of students who drop out at K-State is low.

"The vast majority don't withdraw and are able to keep their aid," Moeder said.

The payback amount is based on how much school the student doesn't complete, Moeder said.

The amount also would depend on how much was spent on tuition and how much was spent on living expenses. For example, if students receive a grant of $3,000, and pay $2,000 in tuition, they would owe the government $325, a little more than 10 percent. The amount must be paid within 45 days of notification of withdrawal.

Moeder said he doesn't think the new rule, which takes effect July 1, 2000, will change students' minds about accepting Pell grants.

However, he also said that if a student does have to drop out, K-State will try to help as much as possible.

"We'll do everything we can to reduce the amount the student must pay back. As long as the law will allow it, we're going to put the least amount of financial burden on the student as we can," Moeder said.

Virtual Career Fair to debut in January

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's a career fair with a twist.

Mary Marston, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said K-State will be having its first Virtual Career Fair on Jan. 31-Feb. 4, 2000. She said the fair will allow students to log onto the Web site 24 hours a day and search by category for summer internships and co-ops.

■ ON THE WEB
More information on Career and Employment Services is available on the Web at www.ksu.edu/ces.

"It is a quick and convenient way for students to register and send their résumés to many employers at once," Marston said. "Then employers can download the résumés and contact individuals for interviews in a more time- and cost-efficient manner."

Tracey Fraser, director of Career and Employment Services, said in the past, it has sought to find creative projects to bring attention to the internship opportunities available to students.

She said now that software is available to offer a online career fair, they are able to fulfill students' requests for the new and innovative way to search for summer opportunities.

"This a way to promote to students the experience they will need that will complement their major," Fraser said. "Other campuses have done this type of program, and students have been asking for K-State to do it too."

Marston said the University of Missouri-Kansas City did a program similar to K-State's version of the Virtual Career Fair, however, UMKC included both career and internship possibilities.

"Most companies begin looking for employees right after Christmas," Marston said. "With the career fair online, students can begin looking at the beginning of the new semester for internships."

The career fair is open to all students who are registered with Career and Employment Services. They can log onto the Web site, read about each job description the company has available and send their résumés to the ones they are interested in.

Marston said companies have to pay $100 for the booth, and they then can post an unlimited amount of positions. One of the advantages to having a career fair online Marston said, is time and cost efficiency.

"This is a way for us to offer a career fair without having to put a lot on our staff," Marston said. "It also cuts down on the expense and the time of planning a large one such as the Career Fair in Bramlage Coliseum each year."

Senate president to propose tax increase in next session

OVERLAND PARK, Kan. — Senate President Dick Bond said Wednesday that he would propose a tax increase when the Legislature goes back in session in January because taxes were cut too much in the last session.

"We — Republicans, Democrats, conservatives and liberals — all cut taxes too much," Bond said at a luncheon of the Overland Park Chamber of Commerce. "Our estimates were wrong."

Bond, R-Overland Park, blamed faulty estimates on how much the food sales-tax rebate and the state earned-income tax credit would cost.

Bond said 20,000 people applied for the sales-tax rebate last year while the state was flooded with 220,000 applications after it was expanded.

Bond said taxes were overcut by $70 million because the projections were incorrect.

Shortfalls in revenue collections have caused Gov. Bill Graves to recommend a 1-percent across-the-board cut in spending.

Bond, who is not running for re-election, said money from a tax increase should go to schools. He said he was not sure what form the tax increase would take or how much it would raise.

He said he favored either an increase in the sales tax or an increase in the state's 20-mill school levy. That tax rate had been reduced from 35 mills.

Investigators find sounds, no voices on plane recorder

PIERRE, S.D. — The cockpit voice recorder from Payne Stewart's shattered Learjet has yielded various noises but no voices from the final moments of the doomed flight — just as investigators had expected.

However, those noises could help establish the cause of the accident that killed the golfer and five others Oct. 25, National Transportation Safety Board spokesman Paul Schlamm said Thursday.

"There are various sounds and noises we're working on. We are hopeful that will lead to some useful information that will help in the investigation," he said.

The plane crashed in a South Dakota pasture four hours after it left Orlando, Fla., on a flight to Texas. It flew 1,400 miles across the country, apparently on auto pilot, before it ran out of fuel.

Investigators are looking into the possibility that the jet lost cabin pressure soon after takeoff, causing everyone on board to die or lose consciousness from lack of oxygen.

Grocery-store clerk found dead in southeast Kansas

CHANUTE, Kan. — Police are investigating an apparent homicide in Chanute where a grocery-store employee was found dead Wednesday night, police said.

Judd L. Gossett, 24, of Iola, was found at about 10:45 p.m. Wednesday by his co-workers at a Save-A-Lot grocery store. Further information was not immediately available.

Officers from the Chanute Police Department, Neosho County Police Department and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation are investigating the case.

Man convicted of attacking Shepard gets life sentence

LARAMIE, Wyo.— Aaron McKinney, who beat gay college student Matthew Shepard and left him to die on the prairie, avoided the death penalty Thursday by agreeing to serve life in prison without parole and promising never to appeal his conviction.

Shepard's parents agreed to the deal.

"I would like nothing better than to see you die, Mr. McKinney, but now is the time to begin the healing process," Shepard's father, Dennis, said in court.

"Every time you celebrate Christmas, a birthday or the Fourth of July, remember Matthew isn't. Every time you wake up in that prison cell, remember you had the opportunity and the ability to stop your actions that night."

McKinney, 22, a high school dropout and drug dealer, is the second defendant in Shepard's slaying to get life in prison. Russell Henderson, 22, pleaded guilty to murder earlier this year.

McKinney was convicted Wednesday of murder, aggravated robbery and kidnapping for luring Shepard from a Laramie bar, robbing him of $20, lashing him to a fence and cracking his skull with blows from a pistol. Investigators said robbery was the main motive, but that McKinney and Henderson singled out the slightly built Shepard because he was gay.

The jury was to begin hearing arguments Thursday on whether McKinney should get the death penalty or life in prison. Instead, he accepted a deal that his lawyers had proposed to prosecutors Wednesday.

"I really don't know what to say other than that I'm truly sorry to the entire Shepard family," McKinney said in court. "Never will a day go by I won't be ashamed for what I have done."

Dole reports $8 million loss, anticipates massive lay-offs

WESTLAKE VILLAGE, Calif. — Dole Food Co. said Thursday that it lost $8 million in the third quarter and will lay off nearly 9,000 workers worldwide, mostly in Latin America.

The world's biggest producer of fresh fruit, vegetables and flowers cited weak European demand for bananas and the cost of rebuilding Central American operations damaged a year ago by Hurricane Mitch.

Dole's net loss amounted to 14 cents a share, compared with earnings of $15.6 million, or 26 cents a share, during third quarter 1998.

Panel discusses alternatives to help deter juvenile crime

BY TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Discouraging repeat offenders from entering the juvenile justice system is the best way to steer young people from a life of crime, District Judge David Stutzman said.

At the presentation "Juvenile Justice: A Local Strategy," a panel of local authorities who work with juvenile crime said offenders should take accountability for their actions. Stutzman said although the state has several tools available to combat juvenile crime, tougher penalties are rarely a solution.

"I'm not convinced that a juvenile is going to think that since the penalty is tougher, they won't commit a crime," he said. "I don't think there is a great deal of thought that goes into it."

Linda Teener, director of UFM, said each judicial district in Kansas is required to observe trends in juvenile crime. The districts also must develop a strategic plan using collected data to prevent juvenile crime in their respective communities.

Brenda Jordan, assistant Riley County attorney, said the teen court program is one tool the county uses to fight juvenile crime. In court, offenders face a jury of teen-agers who impose a punishment, leaving most decision-making to the teen jurors.

She said the court uses peer pressure as a positive influence on juveniles.

"We had spent years preaching to these offenders, telling them they had done wrong, but for certain individuals, they weren't listening," Jordan said.

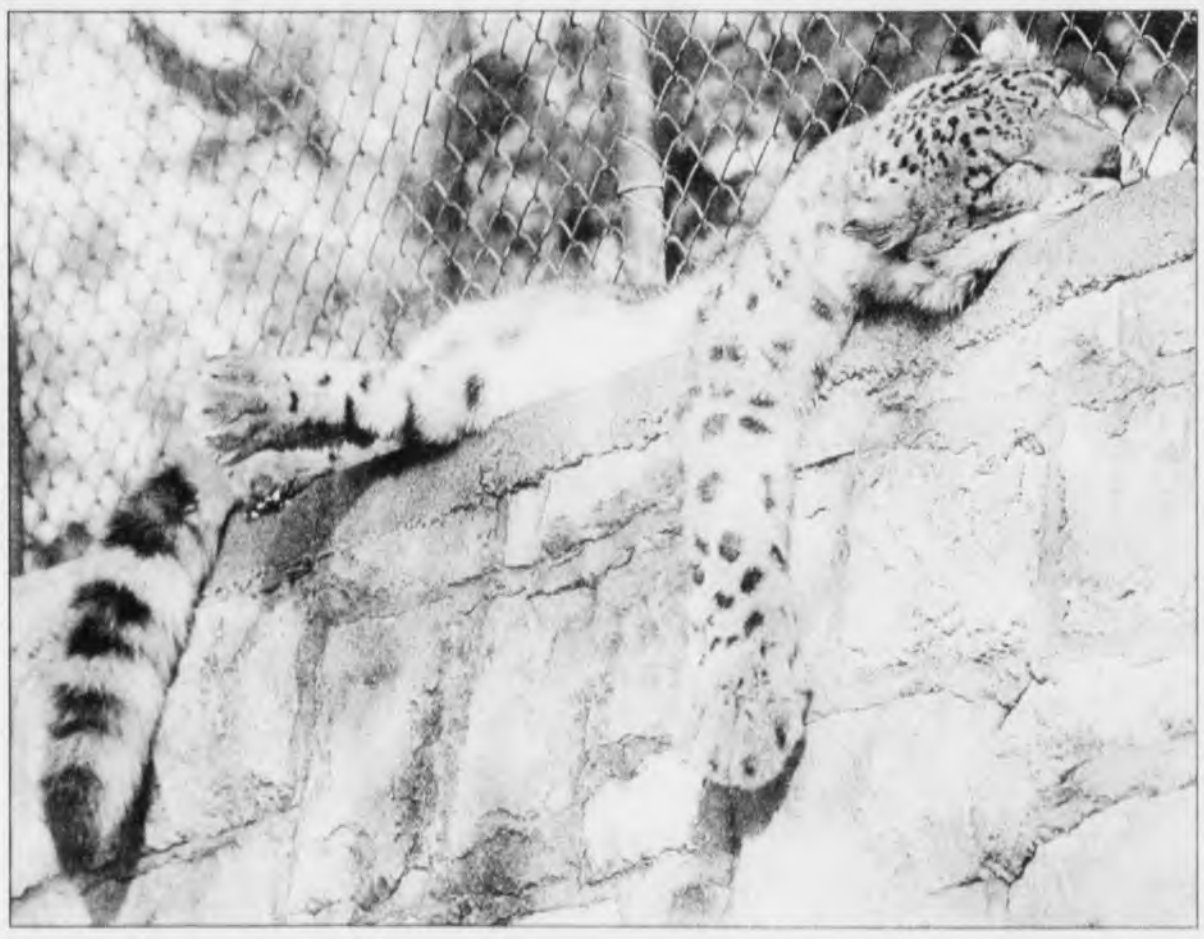
The county also uses a juvenile diversion program to offer counseling or impose community service work on a juvenile offender.

In severe cases, formal charges are brought against the offender.

According to the Justice Department, almost 1 million children ages 12 to 19 are raped, robbed or assaulted each year, with juvenile crime rates tripling since 1965.

Frank McCoy, director of Riley County Community Corrections, said about 540 juveniles were taken into custody in the county last year. He said most offenders are rehabilitated in the system and do not return.

"We sit down with the juvenile and the parents and ask them some questions, which starts the ball rolling to make assessments of risk factors," he said. "If we try to apply logic as to why the juvenile got into this situation, I don't think we would come up with many answers."



Rebecca Hardy, sophomore in fashion design, said the presentation offered her a better understanding of the local juvenile justice system.

"It was interesting to hear about the juvenile system in Manhattan, because I really haven't noticed that many youths getting into trouble here," she said. "It is interesting to see how a small community alters its judicial system."

According to the National Issues Forum, the rate of unwed mothers increased from 7 percent in 1965 to 30 percent in 1991. Stutzman said children raised in single-parent families might be more likely to become juvenile offenders.

Stutzman said about 5 to 10 percent of offenders have two parents in the courtroom during their trial — in some cases, no parent is in attendance.

"How do you get through to that juvenile to say it matters what you do?" he said. "When you get two parents there who say our son or daughter screwed up, I think your success goes up dramatically."

Speaker says education key to preventing abortions

BY CHRISTINA HOGGATT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Education is the main focus in addressing the needs and issues that women face about abortion and pregnancy, a member of Feminists For Life of Kansas said Thursday.

Anita Chase, co-editor of Kansas Feminists and board member of Feminists For Life of Kansas, discussed the principles and beliefs of Feminists For Life and the programs it offers.

Chase said members of Feminists For Life are concerned with all issues women face and want to make life easier for them and their children.

"We believe that abortion is the ultimate exploitation of women," Chase said. "Our programs want to make the adoption process easier for the children and the parents. We want to work with the kids in a foster-care system after birth and really stress the education of teens and college students."

Chase said educating teen-agers on the decision-making process and letting them know what is really happening is key in preventing abortions. She also noted the importance of offering more options on college campuses for pregnant women and parents.

"We want teens to be aware of the decision of reproduction and also realize the empoweredness a women has to say no," Chase said. "Feminists For Life of Kansas want to make it easier for women to continue their education after having a child and work directly with college campuses to make more options available."

Jennifer Talkington-Howard, former president of the K-State Students For the Right to Life and co-editor of Kansas Feminist, also spoke on wanting to increase education for women, especially about sexual assault and domestic violence, as well as offering women alternatives for abortion.

"We try to educate women on safety and encourage learning self-defense," Talkington-Howard said. "We also work with legislature in controlling domestic violence laws."

She said abortion is an unregulated medical practice and is a dangerous procedure with high rates of failure.

The group offers women better alternatives instead of turning to abortion, such as nursing stations, tuition assistance, and day care in school and the workplace, Talkington-Howard said.

She also said the group believes abortion and rape are forms of violence, and people can't stop crime with another act of violence. Women who have an abortion after an assault or rape just add more shame to the already occurring crisis in their lives, she said

> "I am so thankful that there is an organization that is so pro-active in working for women and children."
> — Tiffany Pollard president of K-State Students for the Right to Life

Sarah Anderson, senior in social work, said she disagreed with Feminists For Life of Kansas' viewpoint on rape and abortion.

"If a women is raped, it is her right to choose, and that should never be taken away from a person," Anderson said. "I personally believe that it's a woman's choice and is nobody else's business."

Chase and Talkington-Howard said every child's life has value, and every life is a gift. They also said people shouldn't be able to take away a child's right to life, and that Feminists For Life of Kansas deals with all issues directly affecting women, not just abortion.

Tiffany Pollard, president of K-State Students For the Right to Life, said she was pleased to see the number of students interested in feminist issues, and she said she appreciates such a great organization.

"I am so thankful that there is an organization that is so pro-active in working for women and children," Pollard said. "They also stand up for equal rights of all people regardless of gender, age or any other factor."

Russia highlights forces to denounce U.S. request to amend nuclear treaty

BY VLADIMIR ISACHENKOV
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — With saber-rattling reminiscent of the Cold War, Russia's military has been making a rare show of its nuclear forces as Moscow denounces U.S. calls to amend a key nuclear arms-limitation treaty.

In recent days, the military staged a firing of an anti-missile rocket, talked of putting multiple warheads on missiles capable of reaching the United States and acquired more strategic bombers.

The moves are widely seen as a response to Washington, D.C.'s call to amend the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty to allow both nations' defenses against limited nuclear attacks by other states.

Russian leaders said the U.S. move could unravel decades of nuclear arms control and push the world into a new arms race.

Russian leader Boris Yeltsin said in a recent letter to President Clinton that the U.S. plan would have extremely dangerous consequences for the entire disarmament process.

To underline the political protests, the Russian military fired an interceptor missile designed to knock down ballistic missiles — the first such test in years.

Col. Gen. Vladimir Yakovlev, the Russian Strategic Missile Forces chief, said Tuesday's test confirmed the weapon remains combat-ready.

Offensive nicknames need re-examination

There is something to be said for tradition. That doesn't mean, however, that some traditions, like rules, were meant to be re-examined and abandoned.

Without re-examination and abandonment, women still would be whispering in their husbands' ears for whom they should vote in the next election and black people would be pulling bales of cotton across a plantation in South Carolina. When a tradition is offensive to a segment of the population, it's time that tradition is re-examined.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

Each team using some form of the American Indian as a mascot should examine its use of a race of people as mascot. That isn't to say every team should abandon its tradition, but it should look at the historical significance of its mascot and how that mascot is portrayed.

Take, for example, Kansas City's professional football team, the Chiefs. Those in the Chiefs' front office promote the team without using ever using an American Indian chief in a derogatory way. The title "Chief," refers to the leader in an American Indian tribe, but it is a title and the mascot isn't an American Indian nor does the Chief mascot dress or act in any stereotypical fashion. In fact, the mascot that parades around Arrowhead Stadium is a wolf, KC Wolf, dressed in Kansas City Chief red, white and gold.

On the other hand, consider the Washington Redskins, Washington D.C.'s professional football team. The term "Redskin" in and of itself is disrespectful. The term derives from early settler days, when pioneers hunted and killed American Indians for sport. As part of hunting competition, judges counted the number of American Indian scalps or "redskins" with which each hunter returned. The history behind the title is reason enough for Washington's professional football team to change its name.

As long as the titles are used respectfully and promoted with dignity, the use of an American Indian as mascot is a tradition that shouldn't be abandoned necessarily. Those who have concerns about team mascots should not be ignored, however. In some cases, it might be deemed that they are being too sensitive; in others, it might be deemed that their concerns are warranted. Either way, there's no time like the present to re-examine the tradition.

Billy Ray Cyrus leads wannabe rebels who sport schizophrenic haircut

APRYL MATHES

I listened to all of the messages on Campus Fourum a few weeks ago. It's not like I have any decision power on what gets in, because I'm just a columnist, after all, but some of the people are pretty funny. There was this one girl who said something to this effect:

"First, Apryl Mathes writes about her poor performance in school. Then she writes about how she threw up after her 21st birthday. How does she expect us to take her seriously?"

I guess she's right. All my efforts to write about relevant and meaningful topics, such as swimsuit shopping and soap operas, and you mean to tell me that readers don't take me seriously? I guess my hopes to become a war correspondent for the Post are in the crapper.

In response, I feel compelled to discuss something we should all regard as a serious matter, a topic that is often overlooked.

Today, I want to talk to you about a travesty of hair.

I speak of the mullet.

A mullet is, quite simply, a haircut with short hair on the sides and long hair in the back — also commonly referred to as a short-long, ape drape, neck warmer or squirrel pelt.

It's kind of a schizophrenic haircut — as though wearers can't decide if they want to be a rebel or a stock broker.

They want it all.

Think Scott Baio. Or better yet, think Billy Ray Cyrus.

You might think just because the haircut went out of style in 1986, people no longer would sport it around town. Yet people do, and with flair. I saw a guy the other day on campus walking with confidence as he flipped his long, weed-like mullet around his shoulders. It was as though he was saying, 'Come join me and my mullet-wearing friends, and together we shall rule the world with our good looks.'

From my research into the matter, I have deduced mullets require a great deal of grooming. They like to be watered and combed. Remember how often Steve Sanders ran a pick through his curly mullet?

Mullets are everywhere, but especially at NASCAR and country music concerts. And if you're in the mood for an action mullet, I suggest hockey or baseball.

The first step in mullet prevention is detection. Instead of using the Campus Fourum as an opportunity for greeks and independents to trade insults, I think we should now reserve that space primarily for mullet sightings.

Dear readers, we must take up arms — as in scissors — and rid the world, or at least our campus, of this tacky nuisance. Encourage your mullet-wearing friends to take a big step into the '90s with a fresh look. Perhaps you could slip a gift certificate to Snip 'n' Clip in their stockings.

If you have a David Bowie-esque cut, you've been warned.

Questions of Biblical Christianity arise from misunderstanding of God

SCOTT RONEY

"How could a loving God send people to Hell?"

"How can you say that Jesus is the only way to God?"

These are usually the two biggest objections presented against Biblical Christianity. They are questions that require an answer, and I intend to present that answer. It won't necessarily be an easy or inoffensive answer. But I am convinced that it is the truth.

We ask the above questions because we misunderstand both the nature of God and the nature of mankind. To understand these things, we really have to answer another, more fundamental question.

Why did Jesus have to die?

It all starts with a problem that all of humanity has — sin. This problem is as obvious as the daily headlines. We all, without exception, have turned away from God and broken His commandments. Look just at the first ten — mankind has broken all of these. We have coveted, we have hated, we have lusted, we have lied and we have sought after anything and everything but God. We all have failed to love God with all of our heart, mind, soul and strength and failed to always love others as much as we love ourselves.

King David of Israel observed, "There is no one righteous, not even one... no one who seeks God" (Psalms 14:1-3, 53:1-3). The prophet Isaiah stated, "All our righteous acts are like filthy rags" (verse 64:6).

We all like to think we are good people, but compared with God's idea of good, we are not. We all have been tried and found guilty, even by our own consciences.

Most of us know there is a God to whom we are accountable. Yet even in cases where we know what is right, we all have chosen at times to do wrong.

Knowing the condition of mankind, how does this compare to God? There are a few fundamental attributes of God that are mentioned so many times in the Bible, it nearly becomes redundant. God is absolutely holy, completely righteous and perfectly just. No one who is impure or sinful can exist in his presence.

Because of his justice, he cannot simply let us off when we are guilty. It would not be just. Injustice is contrary to the nature of who God is. His justice demands payment for sin. What is that payment? Death and complete separation from His presence.

The real question is not, "How can a loving God send people to Hell?" but, "How can a holy, just, righteous God allow a sinful individual into his presence?"

That is the situation in which we find ourselves in. Guilty, sinful and a trillion miles from God, and with no remedy we can invent or work out, regardless of our effort. Like an unremovable stain that we wish we had never made, our sin is there.

If this were the whole story, there would be no purpose for me to write this or for you to read it. But the story does not end there. There is hope.

There is another attribute of God that I alluded to earlier. God is love (I John 4:16). Not only is God loving, he is love itself. God's nature is the definition of love. He is merciful and compassionate. God created mankind to know him, experience his presence, receive his blessings and live a full, abundant life (John 10:10). We are his passion, the supreme objects of his love.

Obviously there is a problem here. God's justice requires that we be separated and punished, but because of his love, he desires the exact opposite. In fact, Hell is absolutely the last thing he desires for anyone.

Faced with this reality, there was only one drastic solution. Had there been any other way, God surely would have chosen it. But there was and is not. The only way God could perfectly love us and be perfectly just was to send his one and only son, Jesus Christ, to Earth to take the punishment for our sins. In doing this, God truly made the ultimate sacrifice.

Jesus was fully God and fully human. He faced all the trials and temptations we face, but he lived a perfect life. He then took the punishment that we deserved. His torture and crucifixion are mind-numbing in their sheer brutality. He took our sin upon himself in his horrifyingly painful death. In the ultimate act of love, He paid the price we could not pay.

Had there been any other way for us to be made right with God, Jesus' death would have been senseless and pointless. God would not have taken upon himself the punishment we deserved unless there was no other way for us to be brought back into a loving relationship with him.

No other religious leader throughout history lived a completely perfect, absolutely holy life. No other religious leader is even claimed to have risen from the dead. Jesus alone not only claimed to be the son of God, but lived a completely perfect life, paid for our wrongs, and proved his deity by his resurrection. He was seen alive by hundreds of people after his death. Historians have tried to explain away the fact of his resurrection for almost 2,000 years, and their entire attempts taken together amount to nothing more than a miserably weak and unsupportable argument.

That is why Jesus died. That is why we cannot come to God and be rescued from eternal punishment any other way than through Jesus.

Well, I didn't claim it would be an easy answer, a comfortable answer or a politically correct answer. But I do claim it is the answer.

K-State fans should stop complaining about BCS

Editor,

I would like to respond to Christopher McLemore's sports column, "Cats' BCS chances nearly non-existent." In my opinion, the Cats should not blame the Bowl Championship Series for not being able to participate in the national championship this year if they go 12-0. They had their chances last year, and they blew it. If they do go unbeaten this season, there are probably still three other unbeaten teams. So, just because the Cats are unbeaten doesn't mean they deserve to play in the national-championship game. Thank you.

Independent/greek battle worthless, graduate says

Editor,

I have been following the greek/independent banter being tossed about on the Campus Fourum via the Electronic Collegian. Having graduated from the hallowed grounds of K-State in December 1991, I'd like to give you the outside view.

During my freshman year at K-State, I lived in Haymaker Hall. At Haymaker, there existed great diversity in the population: city boys and farmers, cool dudes and geeks, smart guys and morons, prudish people and partiers, and everything in between.

At the start of that semester, I joined a fraternity. Guess what? There was the same mix of people in the fraternity as in the residence hall. There wasn't a guy in my house whom you wouldn't find over in Haymaker or living off campus and vice versa.

The main point I want to make for all of you contributing to this ridiculous debate about greeks and independents is: that when you graduate from college and join the working world, nobody cares whether you lived in a fraternity, a sorority, an apartment or a dorm. Nobody. I took it off my résumé after I landed my first job. Why? It's not that I didn't love my experience at my fraternity. I took it off because it just doesn't matter.

I had a great time at K-State and with my fraternity brothers. It was an experience I wouldn't trade for anything. However, you all need to gain a little perspective. Knock off the stereotypes, quit bashing each other and take a chill pill. In college, you'll make some great friends, wherever you choose to live. If you're lucky, they're friends for life — regardless of their greek status.

Now, can we move on to something else in the Campus Fourum please?

Student Senate approves emergency Y2K funding

By LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Director of University Counseling Services Fred Newton said the biofeedback machines need upgrading. Students are hooked up to the machines and then are measured on how well they deal with stressful situations.

Student Senate voted 51-0 to grant University Counseling Services a $3,176 emergency allocation Thursday.

The allocation will be used to make all University Counseling Services's computers Y2K compliant.

Fred Newton, director of University Counseling Services, spoke to Senate last week about the importance of the money for Y2K-compliant computers. He said the biofeedback machines needed upgrading.

Privilege Fee Chair Ryan Walker said students are hooked up to the machines and then are measured on how well they deal with stressful situations. The machines then provide feedback for the students on how to handle stress better.

Newton said that when he had the computers assessed, the only thing that didn't need upgrading were the monitors.

Walker said the request was a valid one.

"The machines are a valuable tool for students and needed to be funded," Walker said. "Dr. Newton gave us a lot of information about the machines."

Newton changed to his allocation request from around $4,000 to $3,176 after he consulted Computing and Networking Services.

The money will come from the Privilege Fee Committee's reserve account for emergency allocations and will not raise student fees.

Student Publications Inc., which operates the Collegian and the Royal Purple, will receive $255,994 in a 5.88-percent increase from the committee.

There will be an equipment budget decrease from $63,000 to $60,001.20 — a 4.76-percent decrease.

The Chinese Student and Scholar Association will receive $310 for telephone and address directories.

Student Senate also approved commendations for two students, Michael Springer and Leslie Small.

Springer was chosen as the American Star Farmer by FFA, and Small was elected as the central region vice president of FFA.

"This does great things for Kansas and especially Kansas State University," Senate Chair Jake Worcester said.

A resolution with recommendations as to how to restructure the Fine Arts Council was introduced.

This newest proposal will do three things to restructure the council.

Part one eliminates faculty vote from all student fine-arts organization allocations.

Part two would restructure the student membership in part by adding Student Governing Association appointees.

Part three would restructure the carry-forward allowance.

If the resolution passes, the council has until Dec. 1 to make the changes.

This resolution is the third piece of legislation regarding the restructuring. Final action on the resolution will take place next Thursday.

Baseline training provides insight into drug, alcohol abuse

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Tammy Handly was a teenager, it was hard for her to understand why her parents would do one thing, and then tell her to do the other.

After participating in a Kansas Baseline training program, Handly, an Onaga, Kan., resident, found it easier to put herself in the position of her two teen-age daughters.

"A lot of the answers coming in had to do with accountability," Handly said. "It boils down to what children grow up seeing."

Kansas Baseline, which helps participants gain an awareness of the effects of drugs, alcohol and tobacco on families, is a two-day training program which began Thursday and will continue today. Becky Wassom, community prevention consultant and Baseline trainer, said the objective is to focus on attitudes toward problems in the family and community.

"Many of the participants share common situations," Wassom said. "Those with children are getting into an age group where substance abuse is an issue."

The training session, in the First Lutheran Church ELCA on Poyntz Avenue, attracted mostly professionals who must deal with drug and alcohol issues during the course of their jobs. Between 20 and 25 people attended the session.

Handly, who is a nurse, will receive continuing education units as a result of participating in Baseline. She said the training was open-minded and non-judgmental, and it was easy for people to share opinions.

"It's neat to have the activities set up so that everyone interacts," Handly said. "It's good to know that your views are valid, not right or wrong."

The Baseline program originated in 1983, when it was called Star Baseline. Sarah Weikal, community prevention consultant and Baseline trainer, said it was established to concentrate on middle school students but since has provided services to teens and adults.

Weikal said Baseline serves eight counties in Kansas and is funded through a government grant. It is a program of Pawnee Mental Health Services in Manhattan.

"Our main focus is on abuse, dependency, families and addiction," Weikal said. "We hope participants will have a positive experience and help others realize the importance of drug-abuse prevention."

Barbara Fountain, a Court Appointed Special Advocate member, was in attendance to help fill 12 hours required for her CASA certification. She said the program gives insight into possible cases dealing with drugs and alcohol.

"The bottom line, although there were different opinions, was getting to the base of the problem," Fountain said.

Although the program serves as an opportunity to gain 12 continuing education units, Carol Wege, Onaga resident, said Baseline helps her and Handly to be more aware of the methods they can use as nurses to help children learn more about alcohol and drug abuse.

"Most of the concern dealt with underage drinking," said Cari Misch, graduate student in family studies and human services. "The trainers were very good, kept it fun and promoted open discussion about feelings."

OPENING NIGHT

Men's basketball team opens exhibition season tonight at Bramlage

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's basketball team opens its season tonight with an exhibition matchup against the California All-Stars at Bramlage Coliseum.

For the Wildcats, the youthfulness of the squad poses many questions this season. They return just three seniors: last season's scoring leader, Cortez Groves, who averaged 9.9 points per game; Tony Kitt, and Josh Reid. They added a trio of transfers in 6-foot guard Galen Morrison, 6-foot-9-inch forward/center Kelvin Howell and 6-foot-9-inch forward Ivan Sulic.

Joining the nucleus of seniors and transfers are a number of freshmen who are contending for substantial playing time.

Last year's KBCA Mr. Basketball from Junction City, Kan., Quentin Buchanan is expected to push for a starting spot along with 6-foot-1-inch guard Kenyatta Dix from Gainesville, Fla.

Head coach Tom Asbury said the exhibition game doesn't mean a lot to him because it's so early in the season. He said he is more concerned with his own team.

"We're not going to spend a lot of time worrying about them," Asbury said. "We have enough to be worried about in our own house. The kind of approach we take with our exhibition games, we try to come up with a predetermined minute rotation and kind of stick with it.

"Generally speaking, we've had some success. The competitiveness comes out, and I think that if we didn't do it that way, then we probably would not get to look at some guys under that type of condition, when the game is 100-percent meaningless in the win-loss perspective, but from evaluation it's a tremendous value."

Asbury said he wasn't sure who would be making the start for the Cats. He said he probably will look at players who wouldn't be the starters.

"I'm not going to start who I perceive would probably be the starters," Asbury said. "Right now, I'm probably going to split the squad. I'm going to wait to see how things go for the rest of the week. That will be a game-time decision."

Asbury's going with this scheme because he doesn't want his players to get used to certain combinations this early, keeping in mind that Asbury

Cat fans should step up, support basketball team

MIKE VIETTI

When "ESPN Gameday" came to Manhattan last year, seemingly every K-State fan proudly wore a shirt on his or her back that read, "home of the best fans in college football."

Maybe we are, and maybe we aren't — that's simply too tough a thing to measure.

How about K-State basketball? I think it's safe to say that K-State's men's basketball fans don't rank favorably with a good half of the 300-plus NCAA Division I schools.

If shirts were to be printed up for our men's basketball team, what would they say? I'm thinking something like, "home of the best moderately supportive fans in college basketball."

When K-State played host to Texas Christian last year in the first round of the postseason National Invitation Tournament and barely more than 7,000 people showed up, me included, I was, in a couple of words, pissed off.

K-State finished last season 20-13, a better record than most of the 300-plus D-1 schools, so why can't our fans rank up there with K-State's record?

Upon saying that to the typical Wildcat fan who attends all home football games, tailgates at said football games for hours on end, goes to at least one or two away K-State football games, spends hundreds of dollars to go to whichever bowl game we play in and sits through the meaningless three-hour spring game (I just caught my breath), I get typical infuriating responses:

"The basketball team sucks."

"Tom Asbury sucks."

"Why should I pay money to see a crappy team?"

"They're just going to lose."

"I've got better things to do."

"I'd go if they played in Ahearn."

"The games are boring."

"They lose all the Big 12 games."

"KU beats them every year."

"They don't have any good players."

Anyone notice a pattern here, besides the sheer stupidity? Most students on this campus refer to the K-State men's basketball team as them, they, it, etc.

In contrast, everyone on this campus refers to the football team as we, our, us, etc.

Why?

Just because the basketball team hasn't finished in the top 10 at the end of the season recently? That's enough justification to stop considering the men's basketball team part of this campus?

The current state of the men's basketball program is a direct result of how bad we as fans are. Imagine yourself as a highly touted basketball recruit. You decide to take a visit to KU and, just for the sake of using up all your allowed visits, you stop on by at K-State. Now, KU might not have as up-to-date facilities as K-State (I think Allen Fieldhouse is older than the Unfrozen Caveman Lawyer), but it does have excellent fans.

K-State loses on that sole principle. I know I would rather go to a school that can put more than 10,000 people in the stands for more than four games a year (Yep, that's us last year) than a school that can't.

Not that the players K-State has right now are terrible, but to be honest, you can't confuse them with any of the McDonald's All-Americans. Without the student body showing up to each and every game in full force, the men's basketball program never will return to the elite status this campus used to enjoy.

Don't blame Asbury. I give him credit for even being able to get good players to come to K-State. Seriously, if you were a stud basketball player, would you want to play in front of crowds of 7,000 people? Of course not, and that's why we don't have any Quentin Richardsons or Scoonie Penns or Maurice Evanses.

Hell, we couldn't even get Carlos Boozer to come here, despite the fact that his father, Bob, is one of the best players in school history. Whose fault is it?

Well, let's go through a checklist here: K-State has top-notch facilities, so that can't be the problem. K-State has a solid coaching staff that has won at other, smaller schools, so that isn't it either. K-State has a great tradition of winning with coaches like Tex Winter and Jack Hartman, so that can't be it.

Hmm ... that only leaves one thing: us.

That's right, it's our fault. K-State won't move into the upper echelon without us. The sports gods already have granted us one miracle (I don't have to say what that is), and we're not going to get another.

If we start to show up to games, to cheer for more than a minute at a time, just to generally get excited about K-State basketball, then who wouldn't want to come here?

The answer is nobody. So, the choice is entirely ours. We can keep dismissing the men's basketball team as next to nothing, or we can propel it back to where it belongs.

Just remember — though — if things don't change, we only have ourselves to blame.

Volleyball team looks to halt losing streak

BY IVAN KOZAR
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Earlier in the season, the No. 17 K-State volleyball team (15-6, 9-4) looked unstoppable as it defeated the No. 13 Nebraska Cornhuskers in Lincoln and climbed to the top of the Big 12 Conference, claiming the title of the surprise team of the year.

Now the volleyball team, after losing its third consecutive match Wednesday night against No. 24 Colorado, looks to climb back into the Big 12 title chase as it travels Saturday to Ames, Iowa, to take on a struggling Iowa State team.

The Cyclones (2-17) have yet to win a conference game, and the Cats will look to refocus their efforts.

"I think every team is tired in the last month of the season, more so mentally, because as the season goes, it's tough to stay focused on the things you need to focus on," head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"Early on, it's pretty easy — you're implementing different components into both your offense and your defense, and people are improving, you get to test those things. But as the season goes on, there's a lot of stuff that creeps in that can distract people, and I think that's happened a little bit, not just with the girls on the team, but also the staff."

With Texas A&M, Nebraska and Texas tied for first in the Big 12 with at 10-3, the Cats are not out of the title chase.

With seven games left in the season, the Cats are tied for second place with Baylor.

"What we need to think about is, 'Let's just practice well, let's get better.' And when you get better, good things happen, and we haven't done that for a while," McLaughlin said.

In the first meeting of the season against Iowa State, the Wildcats swept the Cyclones, 15-2, 15-3 and 15-6, at Ahearn Field House.

Women's basketball team boasts added depth

■ Recovered players, new recruits contribute to No. 7 team in Big 12.

BY SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Wildcat women's basketball team takes the court this season with a deeper bench because of numerous recoveries from injuries.

Head coach Deb Patterson said the team looks as good as it has since she has been here.

"They've gone through some real significant injuries that no one had control over," Patterson said. "I think we're as strong as we've ever been. I think we're going to be right in the hunt."

The addition of junior April Sailors, a transfer from Trinity Valley (Texas) Community College, allows Kim Woodlee to move out of the backup point-guard position. Junior Morgen Finneran will back up Sailors.

"April is a real dynamo," Patterson said. "She's a real point guard, she thinks the game, she sees passing angles, and she sees not just the first pass, but the second and the third."

Senior Jenny Coalson returns this season from a medical redshirt last year. Patterson said the team missed Coalson, particularly on the defensive end.

"The dynamics on the floor have changed tremendously," Patterson said. "Everything Jenny (Coalson) brings to the floor is positive. Jenny brings a multidimensional game to the court."

Although the Cats have strengthened their game on the perimeter, Patterson said she still anticipates her post players to be key.

She plans to keep two of the three seniors on the court at all times.

"The posts, as a team and a group, are going to be the foundation of our team," Patterson said.

Senior center Angie Finkes, who averaged six rebounds a game last year, had surgery last April but said she finally feels healthy.

"I feel great," Finkes said. "This is the best I've felt since I've been here."

Olga Firsova, the Cats' leading scorer off the bench last season and senior center this year, said she feels more prepared for this season than the last, as she missed preseason training last year.

"I've gone through the summer and preseason training, and I think I've done everything I could do," Firsova said. "Last year, I couldn't go through a whole practice. This year, I've gone through every practice."

These two, in combination with senior forward Nicky Ramage, will run the Cats' inside game. Patterson said she hopes to integrate freshman forward Danielle Hutton later in the season, provided Hutton maximizes her opportunity to learn from the seniors.

Firsova said the inside game will be stronger this season because the athletes have played together and can better anticipate each other.

"I think it's a big advantage, because I've played with them one year and we know each other better," Firsova said. "We can read each other better, and I can tell where they're going to go."

Patterson said the difference in Firsova is noticeable — last season she ran a 10-minute mile, and her best this season is a 7:06 mile.

"Olga has improved tenfold from where she was, even in February," Patterson said. "I think she's come to the floor this season with a real mindset to be a smarter defensive player. Now, it just comes down to whether she will put it all together."

The Cats also face the toughest non-conference schedule Patterson said they've seen, but with success in that and in the Big 12 Conference, she hopes for an NCAA Tournament berth.

"Our non-conference schedule is as challenging as it gets," Patterson said. "We've built our program on playing tough teams."

The Cats are No. 7 in the Big 12 preseason rankings.

Patterson attributes this to the fact that very few teams lost significant players, but said she thinks her team can finish in the top five.

Storm chaser's life story includes several unexpected twisters, turns

BY SHARLA ROWLEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The curiosity began the night a tornado warning was issued around the city of Salina, Kan., and a tornado tore up a couple of houses within a mile of Chris Hauser's house.

"Ever since that night, I have been interested in storms," Hauser, sophomore in meteorology, said. "I decided when I turned 16 and got a car I would start chasing them."

With a little help from his father, who was a pilot, he learned how to look at Doppler radar and pick out the strongest point of the storm. These days, Hauser said he finds that point and starts driving into it.

"Whenever I hear about a storm, either on the radio, TV or Internet, I just take off in my car. I got a laptop so I can be in my car hooked up to the Internet and receive a constant update of the storm," Hauser said.

Chasing storms without a way to get data on the storm frequently is dangerous because you don't know what you're driving into, Hauser said.

Even with a laptop, he has had a couple of scary experiences.

"Last year in Brookville, there was baseball-size hail and heavy fog coming up," Hauser said. "It was stupid on my part, because it was in the middle of the night and a tornado could have came down right in front of me without me knowing."

Hauser's family was not as enthusiastic. His mother tried to stop the hobby in high school, when she was staying up some nights until 3 a.m. waiting for her son to get home.

"I try not to chase storms at night anymore, because you can't see the storm. At parties, friends are constantly begging to go with me, but they really don't understand it," Hauser said.

Hauser said he hopes to graduate from K-State in meteorology and go on to the University of Oklahoma to get his doctorate. A minor in English also might be in his future, he said.

"This stuff is so interesting," Hauser said. "I would really like to be able to share and write about my experiences."

Because of the dangers of storm chasing, professionals do not encourage amateurs to do it, Hauser said.

Professional storm chasers get paid to provide timely information to the news to help prevent loss of life, injury and property damage due to severe storms.

"I don't recommend for anyone to start chasing storms without being educated on the topic," Hauser said. "It is an exciting and thrilling experience, but it can be dangerous. You really need to know and study a lot about it."

Executives respond to concerns about long-distance competition

BY KALPANA SRINIVASAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. — The chiefs of MCI WorldCom and Sprint sought to convince lawmakers Thursday that their proposed merger would not limit long-distance choices for consumers and is a necessary response to a dynamic telecommunications marketplace.

Weeks after their $115 billion deal was announced, the two executives faced tough questions from members of the Senate Judiciary Committee about whether consumers would be harmed by consolidating the No. 2 and No. 3 long-distance carriers into one company.

"One need not be a rocket scientist — or even an antitrust lawyer — to be wary of a merger which results in just two dominant players in an industry," said Herb Kohl of Wisconsin, the top Democrat on the Judiciary antitrust subcommittee.

He cited some research from his office: a staffer called AT&T, MCI and Sprint to check out their calling plans and got lower, but differing, rates from both. Kohl questioned whether competition wouldn't be reduced significantly with one fewer player.

"There are plenty of choices that are going to be out there," said William T. Esrey, chairman and chief executive of Sprint.

MCI WorldCom head Bernard J. Ebbers noted there already are more than 600 long-distance companies in the nation.

Navy salvage ship, divers travel to site of EgyptAir crash

BY PAT MILTON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEWPORT, R.I. — With a break in the weather, a Navy salvage ship was finally freed Thursday to take its divers on a 10-hour trip through high waves to the grim crash site of EgyptAir Flight 990.

Investigators were hoping to dodge foul weather long enough today to search for the plane's black boxes, which they hope hold the secret to the cause of the crash off the coast of Nantucket, Mass.

The Navy was relying on seas calming just enough to drop a giant underwater robot — the Deep Drone — into the Atlantic, where it can be lowered 270 feet to the ocean floor to retrieve wreckage and bodies. Divers aboard the USS Grapple will try to make the treacherous journey as well.

The black boxes — the flight data recorder and the cockpit voice recorder — are considered keys to figuring out why Flight 990 plummeted into to the ocean on Sunday, killing all 217 on board.

Without them, the National Transportation Safety Board was investigating all possibilities, learning what it could from radar data and c[illegible]ifests.

NTSB Chairman James Hall said nothing hazardous was apparently in the cargo holds.

He also said there were not two armed guards on the plane, despite a policy of the airline to have them aboard sometimes. He said 30 Egyptian military personnel were required to go through metal detectors before boarding the plane in New York.

The NTSB said it has been studying the possibility of human error in the crash.

A special team of investigators will continue to look into the backgrounds of the flight crew, including how they spent the last days before they embed into the cockpit.

If the sea permits, the Grapple likely will finish its journey to the crash site early this morning. Navy officials said the ship might be forced to turn around if the sea swells are too strong.

The forecast calls for rough seas from late tonight until Sunday.

Navy Rear Adm. William G. Sutton said he would not risk using divers if the seas were too rough today.

"My number one concern here ... is the safety of these young men and women who are going to be out on scene conducting this incredibly dangerous event," he said. "We do not want to increase this tragedy any more than it already is."

A second ship, the Mohawk, a Navy vessel equipped with special sonar and remote operated robots, also was sent out to sea late Thursday.

robot, and the Whiting, a [illegible] Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration vessel, followed the Grapple out to sea. Both are equipped with side-scan sonar, which produces high-resolution images of the ocean floor.

Rough seas and high winds have kept divers away from the crash site since Tuesday.

Large pieces of wreckage likely would stay put some 250 feet below water despite the storms, the salvage team has said.

New program to focus on teaching children healthy life choices

BY BRYAN SCRIBNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The type of environment children grow up in will influence the remainder of their lives greatly, said Judy Johnston, associate of the K-State office of community health extension.

A $1.7 million youth development grant from the National Institutes of Health will provide funding for Healthy Youth Places.

This program, developed in hopes of improving the health of communities, will focus on teaching young students the value of healthy life choices, such as nutritious foods and exercise, said David Dzewaltowski, principal investigator and professor of community health for the Kansas Health Foundation.

"One place to improve public health is in our youth because it's likely to stay with them to adulthood," Dzewaltowski said.

Due to the evolution of life-threatening illness, Dzewaltowski said widespread disease has been replaced by long-term acute problems. He said deaths occurring as a result of cardiovascular disease and cancer can be reduced with physical activity and altered diets.

"Economically, it would save a lot of money in health-care costs," Dzewaltowski said. "We were funded to come up with a model of how this might affect other health behaviors."

"...o expect to b[illegible] a resource to [illegible]e nation. It's [illegible] growing field to improve the health of America."

— David Dzewaltowski, Kansas Health Foundation

Team members contributing to this project are in the process of recruiting middle schools across Kansas to be involved in the study, Dzewaltowski said. Sixteen schools will be selected for this four-year program.

Johnston, who is the co-principal investigator, said the project will use a control group of eight schools. The remaining eight will be studied as the comparison group.

The study will follow these two groups from sixth through ninth grade to focus on long-term health changes. Dzewaltowski said this project is distinctive because it is a true experiment rather than a laboratory study.

"The gist of the project is to study youth development and help students on a personal and group level to become more aware of and be able to change their environment," Johnston said.

Dzewaltowski said the project will benefit Kansas schools with equipment funding, and once the results have been observed, it will be a model to improve schools across Kansas.

"We expect this to be a resource to the nation," Dzewaltowski said. "It's a growing field to improve the health of America."

All schools participating in the experiment will receive computerized slide-card-reader systems, training, two years of system support and mini-grants for science teachers who assist with data collection.

Data collection for the four-year study will begin next spring.

Paula Marmet, team member and director of the Bureau of Health Promotions for the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, said the project will implement policies throughout various school settings to encourage healthier choices among students.

"If the only things available to children in the lunchroom are foods high in sugar and fat, then there are not many choices," Marmet said.

The building of social relationships and the ability to make healthy choices are keys to proper development, Dzewaltowski said.

He said healthy options should be encouraged when only unhealthy options exist.

"People in a healthy environment have the ability to make choices and reinforce good choices. Adolescents placed in a healthy environment tend to live in a healthy environment."

Putnam, Boyd halls to have mixer dance for residents

With the year 2000 drawing near, everyone is looking for a chance to celebrate, and K-State students are no exception.

On Friday night, Putnam and Boyd hall governing boards will sponsor an "End of the Millennium" mixer and dance for residents of Strong Complex. The mixer will be in the basement of Putnam Hall. It begins at 7 and lasts until about 11.

Terence Takeguchi, sophomore in business and co-chairman of the event, said the mixer is free and open to residents of Putnam, Boyd and Van Zile halls. Music for the dance will be provided by Best Sound Around.

In addition to dancing and refreshments, Takeguchi said, prizes will be provided for the winners of several contests, including an award for the best costume. Takeguchi said residents attending the mixer have been asked to dress in the style of their favorite decade.

Karen Gaffin, junior in Spanish, political science and international studies, said she rummaged through her sister's closet to find an outfit to represent her favorite decade — the 1980s.

"I'm looking forward to wearing the pink, puffy prom dress my sister wore to her senior prom in 1988," Gaffin said. "It's very reminiscent of the movie 'Pretty in Pink,' a 1980s' classic."

— Jennifer Kehler

Concert series focuses on folk with concert featuring top artists

BY SARA MARTIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A rich baritone voice will ring through the Manhattan Arts Center theater at 8 tonight as John Gorka, an accomplished folk singer and songwriter, plays his guitar and croons about life in general.

"He's one of the top singer/songwriters in the acoustic singer/songwriter world," said David Kamerer, director of BirdHouse Productions. "He's produced eight albums. He's very funny. He definitely is the most famous artist we've ever booked at BirdHouse."

Steve Martini, a member of the BirdHouse committee, said the committee tries each year to bring one spectacular performer to the series.

"Every season, we try to get the best artists we can, but we also try to get one star that is a little more well-known than the others," he said. "We try to get a more star-quality name. If you're at all into that genre of music, Gorka is a really big name."

Gorka writes all of his own folk songs, reflecting his music to the ups and downs of the average Joe, Kamerer said. His deep voice couples with his acoustic guitar in tender ballads and foot-tapping beats.

"All his songs have an affinity with the likes of the working men," Kamerer said. "He has a beautiful baritone voice. It's rich and butterscotchy. He's a wonderful performer."

Between songs, Gorka becomes a story-teller, explaining the background and meaning behind each of his songs. Both Martini and Kamerer describe him as having a great sense of humor the audience will love.

"He's an accomplished guitarist and his persona is very interesting," Martini said. "He's very amusing, but not at all caught up in himself."

Gorka traditionally plays larger concerts due to his level of popularity. Kamerer said the setting of the arts center's Grosh Performance Hall makes this concert an even better opportunity to hear Gorka play.

"The unique opportunity is to see John Gorka in such an intimate setting," Kamerer said. "He would usually play Liberty Hall in Lawrence, which seats 500. We only seat 160."

Martini said he agrees the art center stage is the ideal place.

"Any seat in the house is no more than 40 feet from the stage," Martini said. "All the seats are great. You can't go wrong."

Greg Greenway, another well-known folk singer who has performed for the BirdHouse series before, will open the show. Martini said seeing both artists in one place makes the evening even sweeter.

"Greg is a little more outgoing," Martini said. "He might be a higher-energy stage presence. We're fortunate to have Gorka, but we're more fortunate to have Greg on the same stage with him."

Tickets are $15 and $12 for students and seniors. They can be purchased at the Dusty Bookshelf in Aggieville, at the Manhattan Arts Center, or at the door on the evening of the concert. However, there are not many tickets left.

Samples of Gorka's music can be heard at www.windham.com/ourmusic/artist_pages/gorka.empty.by artist.html.

Stephen King's newest novel falls below precedent set by previous books

BY MEGAN RICHESON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Stephen King's latest novel, "Hearts in Atlantis," is not "Cujo." While there is a touch of the supernatural, it is almost nothing compared to some of his other novels.

The book itself is broken down into five parts or stories, connected by common characters and events: "Low Men in Yellow Coats," "Hearts of Atlantis," "Blind Willy," "Why We're in Vietnam" and "Heavenly Shades of Night Are Falling." These short stories follow a timeline that begins in 1960 and ends in 1999.

The book in its entirety is King's attempt to analyze the last 39 years of American history creatively.

In the first, and best, story, we are introduced to Bobby Garfield, who has just turned 11 years old. He is a boy with two passions: earning money to buy the bike of his dreams and reading. His world is unlocked when a stranger named Ted moves into Bobby's apartment complex. Ted introduces Bobby to novels such as "Lord of the Flies," as well as the "low men in yellow jackets," the mysterious and menacing villains of the story. Ted himself harbors a rather large secret revealed later in the story.

Book Review

OUT OF 5

Stephen King

"Hearts in Atlantis"

The beauty of the story is King's writing, which often is underappreciated by critics. His style is a combination of harshness, simplicity and intelligence, and he makes his characters understandable.

We are able to detect the unspoken pain Bobby feels at his mother's aloofness, and the reader can understand the reason for her aloofness, a life that has taken a drastic detour from its once-promising future. As Bobby matures throughout the novel, the readers feel the sadness of his world as certain delusions of childhood are destroyed.

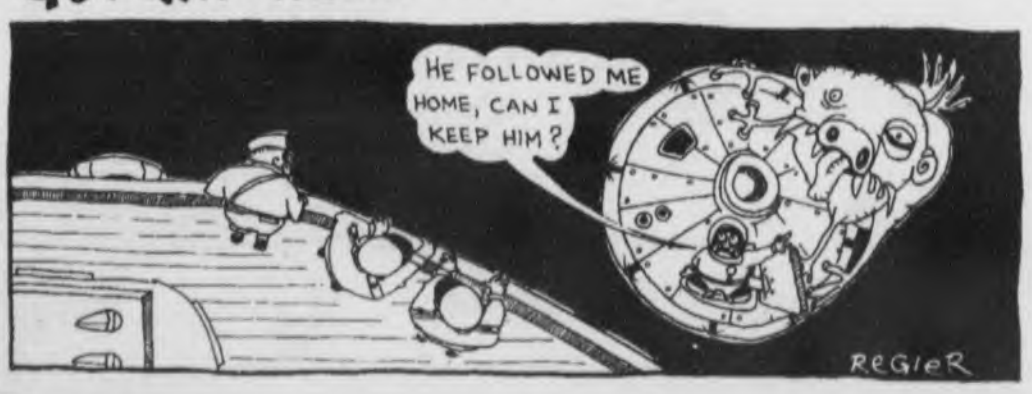
It is a testament to King's skill as a writer that he can switch from "Low Men in Yellow Coats" and write "Blind Willy."

"Blind Willy" would be in second place if I were ranking the different stories. It has an incredibly eerie feel to it. The main character, Bill Shearman, is fascinating and disturbing at the same time. Readers watch in the third-person narrative as Shearman changes personas as easily as he changes clothes. He is a man who is haunted by demons of the past, both from his childhood and the Vietnam War.

As the book carries characters from the first story to the other stories, we see the character of Carol Gerber, who plays the role of tragic heroine and lost love throughout the book.

She reminds readers that kind souls, when faced with cruelty, often break in the end.

For those readers who are familiar with King's previous work, this story will remind you, in style rather than story, of "Rita Hayworth and the Shawshank Redemption." For those who are not familiar with King's work and who only know the movie versions of his novels, this definitely will be an eye-opener.



This book is not a quick read; with more than 500 pages, you will need to be a patient reader. However, the length becomes a moot issue when you're dealing with a storyteller of King's caliber.

The only weakness of the book are the stories "Hearts in Atlantis," for which the entire novel is named, and "Why We're in Vietnam," which seem to to serve as fillers for the book. These two feel awkward and out of place compared to the other three.

In "Heavenly Shades of Night Are Falling," the novel's final story, readers see Bobby Garfield again. The book's ending is somewhat of letdown and leaves several loose ends.

Once you get past these flaws, however, "Hearts in Atlantis" is a good outing for King, which recieves three out of five stars.

have all got a job," he said, "from the secretary to all the route drivers."

Bill Wisdom, director of Vending Services, said it will be a big change that will affect his employees' lives.

"We at the Vending Services department are going to have to view this as an opportunity for the next step that we take in our lives," Wisdom said. "We'll have to see how this works out between now and January 1st."

When the proposal takes effect, it will allocate money for other areas of funding.

K-State President Jon Wefald said the key component of the contract was unrestricted funds that could be channeled to meet the university's needs.

"I am just so pleased that we are going to be able to allocate $5 million to the library and $2.3 million to scholarships," Wefald said.

Wefald said the Department of Intercollegiate Athletic has not been affected by the deal because of a previous PepsiCo contract. The athletic department will continue with its contract with PepsiCo through the duration of the new contract.

The deal's final section of program support allocates $500,000 to marketing and promotions.

The contract also has a section designated for revenue replacement. In that section, $2 million is allocated to the K-State Student Union, which includes Vending Services.

Schellhardt said the negotiation process was competitive between the Coca-Cola Co. and PepsiCo.

"Pepsi was the eventual winner because they had the best proposal for Kansas State University," Schellhardt said.

He specifically mentioned the unrestricted support and the commission the university would receive.

Wefald said he felt the agreement was positive for both parties.

"Thank you so much for coming up with a contract that we could mutually agree with," Wefald said. "It's good for Pepsi Cola, and it's certainly good for Kansas State University."

The $2.3 million allocated toward scholarships will be used as part of a program designed by Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco to lure state valedictorians to K-State, Wefald said.

"He wants to use that for what he calls his First In Class scholarship program, and that money is needed to recruit the valedictorians of the 304 school districts in the state to hopefully come to K-State," Wefald said.

Bosco was not present at the news conference.

Wefald said the additional scholarship funding will be pivotal in keeping K-State competitive in the eyes of top area students.

Hale nears funding goal

The largest portion of contract money comes in the form of money allocated to university libraries.

Wefald said it can be difficult to raise funds for a library, but the $5 million goes a long way toward reaching the library endowment's goal of raising $10 million for the library. Along with other gifts to the fund, Wefald said the fund has now raised about $7 million, and fund-raising is close to being 70-percent completed.

The endowment was started two years ago when K-State's library task force was looking for ways to improve materials found in Hale, Wefald said, including using state money, fund-raising and sponsored research overhead funds.

"As you know, whether it is K-State or any other university, it is very difficult to raise funds for the library," Wefald said. "Nobody has graduated from any library, and it is always difficult."

Wefald said that when alumni are looking to make donations to the university, they generally like to donate money to the department from which they graduated.

"Very seldom do we get unrestricted gifts," Wefald said. "In other words, gifts that come to the president's office that we can do with what we want, it is very rare."

He said the deal with PepsiCo moves the library endowment situation in the right direction.

"Today we can say that were close to 70 percent on the road to that library endowment, and to me that's great news," Wefald said. "We have a beautiful new library, but as you all know, we need the funding within Brice Hobrock's operating budget to buy the subscriptions and monographs to make our library a great library."

Faculty Senate President Marion Gray said the allocation was a bench mark in library funding.

"I really think we are at a historic turning point for the university, and I appreciate that very much," Gray said.

The goal eventually is for K-State to reach Association of Research Libraries status. George Strecker, library task force member, said being a member is like being a member of Division I athletics. He said there are a number of things that must done to become a member of the club, which includes administrative support.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said the money would go directly to library materials.

"This money will exclusively go to endowments from which the income will be used to ensure the fact that we will have books and journals and other things for a generation to come," Hobrock said, "at least at a level much higher than we have had in the past."

Hobrock said the funds would double over a five-year period with the 1997 library task force that was established.

"Effectively, we will double the amount of funds that we will spend for funds over a five-year period from about $3 million to $6 million per year," Hobrock said.

Fraser said more than 8,000 employers have been targeted with this program, which is designed to be more of an introduction for students to potential employers. Follow-up visits are being planned for companies that would like to meet with particular students in face-to-face interviews.

"The same concept as a regular career fair applies, but this is a more time- and cost-effective measure for both students and employers," Fraser said. "We have plans to bring employers here for follow-up visits so that they may come to campus to engage in one-on-one interviews with students."

Jerry Pettibone, director of college and university relations for Jeld-Wen Inc., said he has participated in this kind of program before and has found it helpful in finding students to fill internship positions.

"Students will be able to click on our logo and be taken to our internship Web page," Pettibone said. "This enables us to expose our opportunities to students who participate in this program without us having to be there.

"On the one hand, we can come onto campus and meet with students personally, but if we can reach even more students through a program like this and show them the opportunities they can have with us, we will do that, too."

This is the first time the Oregon-based company, which is the world's largest manufacturer of doors and windows, has recruited at K-State, and Pettibone said he is excited to participate in another career fair on the World Wide Web.

"A program like this helps many employers because they can still participate in the fair even if they can't be there in person," Pettibone said. "We are looking forward to the relationship we are beginning with K-State and exposing more students to the possibilities they can get with us."

Marston said the Virtual Career Fair is a way to allow students the opportunity to view many different jobs at any time of day for a longer period of time than a larger fair allows. She said she has heard of a lot of interest from students about the possibility of doing the program.

"Programs like this are becoming the wave of the future," Marston said. "This is a way to enhance the image of internships and allow employers to look for bright and interested people to fill their positions."

likes to rotate players in and out of the games regularly.

"The way we play and I coach, I think it's overrated for guys to get used to certain combinations of players," Asbury said. "I think that if we have a system, everybody should be able to execute within that system regardless of who's in that system.

"I want to make sure these guys are able to earn their positions."

Asbury said the seniors have earned starting spots from what they have done this year.

"I think there are three spots that the guys would have to go out and lose them, but not in terms of what they did last year, but what they've been able to do this year, and that is Josh, Cortez and Tony," Asbury said. "Those guys have earned a spot, and that is what you would expect them to do, given the amount of experience they've had.

"I don't necessarily have to see those guys together. Cortez may be our second-best point guard, we don't know that, but maybe. As a result, what I may want to do is split that squad up and let Galen play with Quentin, and let Cortez play with Kenyatta. So there you would break up what would traditionally seem like more logical to what you might end up playing with. This is very much an experimental situation, these exhibition games."

Tipoff for the game is set for 7 p.m.

electrical systems. Giles, nephew of the shop's owners, was the general manager.

Outside the Northlake Shipyard building this morning, Chris Dean brought two bouquets of flowers to the doorstep shortly after sunup. He said he knew the victims. Beside his flowers lay a note from someone else, in black marker on yellow lined paper. It read, "Pete — you will always be with us!" and was signed, "The gang."

Giles "was just a super young fellow," his grandfather, Richard Kelly Sr., told KIRO-TV. "Who would expect for a decent, law-abiding, wonderful citizen to get shot in cold blood?"

The other survivor, a 58-year-old man, was in serious condition Thursday with a gunshot wound to the chest, hospital officials said.

Kansas Gas Service encourages you to use your common senses.

Smell something rotten?

It may not be the garbage. If you smell something like rotten eggs – even if it's faint – you may have a natural gas leak in your home. While natural gas is naturally colorless, odorless, and safe, we've added an unnatural scent to warn you of a gas presence in your home. If you think you might have a natural gas leak:

Leave the house immediately and call Kansas Gas Service at 1-800-794-4780 from a neighbor's phone. Don't flip a light switch, light a match or use your telephone, any of which can create a spark that can result in a fire.

Feel headaches dizziness or nausea?

It may be the air you're breathing. If you experience frequent headaches, dizziness, fatigue, excessive perspiration or nausea, you may be suffering symptoms of carbon monoxide poisoning, the result of improper combustion in your gas furnace.

Leave the house immediately. Call 911 from a neighbor's home and your local fire department will be there to test for carbon monoxide levels in your home.

See yellow instead of a blue furnace flame?

It may be a warning sign. Check all your gas appliances regularly to make certain the burner flame is blue. A yellow flame is a sign that your gas fuel is burning inefficiently – that means an increased potential for carbon monoxide poisoning and higher fuel bills.

Ask a qualified heating and cooling contractor to inspect your gas furnace annually. Don't block air intake areas near or around appliances. Clean or replace heating system air filters regularly. Check flue and chimney for proper ventilation.

Before you dig call: 1-800-DIG-SAFE

Each day Kansas Gas Service delivers natural gas to heat homes, cook food, cool commercial buildings and more through a series of underground gas lines. If you plan to dig around your home, please call us at least two days in advance and trained personnel will mark your lines at no charge to you.

For emergencies or to answer any questions call 1-800-794-4780.

Game No.9:
Colorado

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
GAMEDAY

Nov. 5, 1999

A Reversal of History

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER ■ PHOTO BY IVAN KOZAR ■ PHOTO ILLUSTRATION BY ROY ANDREAS

Things have changed in the past two years between the K-State Wildcats and the Colorado Buffaloes.

1997 marked the first time in 13 years that K-State beat Colorado. Two years and new Buffalo head coach Gary Barnett later, the No. 6 Wildcats are looking to make it three wins in a row against the Buffs for the first time.

With the Cats (8-0, 5-0) atop the Big 12 Conference, K-State looks at the Buffaloes (5-3, 4-1) as just another obstacle in the way of completing its run at the ultimate accomplishment, a national title, especially with Nebraska looming.

Head coach Bill Snyder said he doesn't think his team will overlook Colorado because it understands the importance of preparing for its opponents on a week-to-week basis.

"I think our players understand the quality of the football team they're preparing to play in Colorado and how significant the ballgame is," he said.

The contest is scheduled for an 11:30 a.m. kickoff, something the Cats have struggled with this season. In the first morning start, the Cats had to overcome a 28-7 halftime deficit to Iowa State. Just three weeks ago, they battled back from another 21-point deficit to Oklahoma State.

"The first one we didn't play for the first half, and the second one we didn't play for the first quarter, so this one hopefully we'll come out from the get-go and won't have to play catch-up," junior strong safety Jarrod Cooper said. "I think we need to to wake up. At 11:30, running around and hitting people is kind of early, so we just need to wake up and get ready, that's pretty much it."

Cooper said playing against Colorado might have a little bit to do with having a quicker start this week.

"Being at home and 8-0 and playing Colorado, a good team, if you can't be awake for that ..." Cooper said. "It's big time, we're at 8-0 and working on real good here. We'll be awake for that."

Big 12 Lineup

Baylor (1-7, 0-5) at Kansas (3-5, 1-4) 1 p.m.

Baylor will go to Lawrence coming off of a 48-7 loss to K-State, while the Jayhawks will be trying to put the memory of almost beating Nebraska behind them. Kansas is 3-2 at home this season, while averaging 30.6 within the confines of Memorial Stadium. The matchup features two of the near bottom-dwellers in the NCAA in total offense and defense. Baylor is 107th in the country in total offense and 92nd in total defense. Kansas is 92nd in total offense and 94th in total defense.

Iowa State (4-4, 1-4) at Texas Tech (4-4, 3-2) 1 p.m.

The Cyclones lost to Texas in a 44-41 thriller last week, while the Red Raiders were beat by Missouri 34-7. Tech is 62nd in the nation in rushing defense, allowing 149.4 yards per game, while Iowa State enters the contest 10th in the country with 240 rushing yards per game, led by senior Darren Davis, who is averaging 145.5 yards per game.

Texas (7-2, 4-1) at Oklahoma State (3-4, 1-3) 1 p.m.

Oklahoma State got beat 21-3 by Texas A&M last week, while Texas sneaked by Iowa State 44-41. The past two games in the series have been close, with the Cowboys winning 42-16 in Stillwater in 1997 and Texas defeating Oklahoma State 37-34 in Austin last year. Texas running back Hodges Mitchell, 25th in the county in rushing yards per game, will butt heads with the Cowboys' 28th ranked rush defense.

Missouri (4-4, 1-4) at Oklahoma (4-3, 2-2) 2 p.m.

This will be the 88th meeting between the two teams, with the Sooners holding a decisive 59-23-5 edge. The contest could be a make-or-break game for both with the winner moving within one victory of being bowl eligible. Oklahoma lost to Colorado 38-24 last week while the Tigers beat Texas Tech 34-7. Missouri running back Zain Gilmore rushed a school-record 45 times for 165 yards last week, and he will face a Sooners rush defense that ranks 61st in the nation.

Texas A&M (5-2, 3-2) at Nebraska (7-1, 4-1) 2:30 p.m.

The game is a rematch of the Aggies' surprise victory over then-No. 2 Nebraska last year. The Cornhuskers barely got by Kansas last week, while Texas A&M beat Oklahoma State 21-3. The contest figures to be a low-scoring affair, with Nebraska ranking second in the Big 12 in scoring defense at 12.4 points per game and the Aggies coming in right behind them in third with 17.6 points per game.

Wane McGarity is wrapped up by Dyshod Carter and Lamar Chapman after making a catch in the first half of last year's game against Texas in Manhattan. The Wildcats' No. 1 pass defense could be put to the test this weekend against the Colorado Buffaloes.

Colorado to test top-ranked passing defense

BY FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's No. 1 passing defense in the country has yet to be out-played by an opposing team's passing attack this season. Saturday's matchup against Mike Moschetti and the Colorado Buffaloes might prove to be an exception to the rule.

After an injury-riddled 1998 season, Moschetti has cut through opposing defenses like, well, a machete. He has sliced and diced for the Buffaloes, completing 64.6 percent of his passes in seven appearances for Colorado (5-3, 4-1).

Moschetti leads the 19th ranked passing offense in the country with 12 touchdowns and 1,974 yards this season. He ranks second to Nebraska's Eric Crouch in passing efficiency in the Big 12.

"Moschetti is throwing the ball very well," head coach Bill Snyder said. "He can be a roll-out passer, and he is a threat to run with the football. He has a degree of toughness that I certainly like. He is a leader for that football team."

Moschetti's razor-sharp athleticism shined in Colorado's 38-24 victory over No. 24 Oklahoma.

In a Big 12 contest featuring two of the conferences' premier passers, Moschetti out-passed Oklahoma's Josh Heupel, throwing for 345 yards and two touchdowns to earn Big 12 offensive player of the week honors.

Moschetti, a 6-foot senior, accounted for five scores and completed 22 of 31 attempts while Heupel, the Big 12's No. 2 passer, completed 26 of 31 attempts for 328 yards.

"I thought Mike Moschetti played particularly well," head coach Gary Barnett said after Colorado's victory over the Sooners. "He fought that game like a warrior and made some big plays out there."

K-State defensive back Dyshod Carter said Moschetti's adversity as a quarterback allows him to make game-winning plays. In addition to his passing abilities, Moschetti has rushed for five touchdowns this season.

Carter said the K-State defensive backs and the defensive front line must play well in order to stop Moschetti.

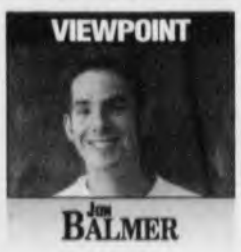
"Mike can run outside of the pocket and can throw very well on the run," Carter said. "He wants the big play. He will do anything to get the big play. Our defensive line and linebacker corps have been doing a good job all year, so if we hold our end of the bargain we will do all right."

Last season in Boulder, the Wildcats squelched the community-college transfer from La Mirada, Calif., in his first season at Colorado. The Wildcats won 16-9 as Moschetti threw for one touchdown and 225 yards against the Cats.

K-State free safety Lamar Chapman said Moschetti has improved after his first season of college football.

"He's throwing the ball better," Chapman said. "He was just out of junior college, and he was just trying to get a feel for Colorado. But now that he has been there for a year, he is making a lot of big plays for them."

K-State's ability to stop the pass has been one of the team's strongest defensive assets this season. The Cats have allowed just 1,048 passing yards this season and have kept their opponents to a 37.2 completion percentage.



In a 35-17 victory over Texas, one of the conference's best passing teams, K-State's pass defense went wild by blitzing quarterback Major Applewhite frequently.

K-State strong safety Jarrod Cooper said the Wildcats' game plan against Moschetti will be no different than it was against Texas.

"We've played him before," he said. "We will stop him the same way we stopped all the other quarterbacks. Just hit him. It is going to be a lot like playing Major Applewhite. We just got to hit and hit some more."

Thirst for offensive showdown quenched against Colorado

VIEWPOINT

JON BALMER

Expect something a little different at KSU Stadium this Saturday when Colorado comes calling.

Something like, say, an exciting football game.

Through five "contests" at the purple horseshoe this season, K-State's closest competition has been UTEP. The mighty Miners lost by a heartbreaking 33-point margin on Sept. 18, the closest anyone's finished against the Cats at home this season. The other four victories all have been 40-plus margin massacres that included Kansas and Baylor. That's right, one of the Cats' non-conference opponents played better than two Big 12 Conference foes. Take that, Jeff Sagarin.

The days of clocking in for another smiting at KSU Stadium should end with the Buffaloes' arrival. Coach Gary Barnett's squad isn't the Boulder bullies they once were, but they possess the one component lacking from the Cats' previous five martyrs: a passing game.

Colorado enters the contest with the No. 19 passing offense in the nation, averaging 279.5 yards per game. The influx of an air attack has helped produce the Buffs' 32.8 points per game average.

Quarterback Mike Moschetti has been racking up yards this season faster than Rick Neuheisel can say "sweater vest." Last Saturday, the senior QB tore through Bob Stoops' secondary for 382 yards and four touchdowns in Colorado's 38-24 against Oklahoma. A Mount San Antonio College transfer, Moschetti scorched San Jose State for a school-record 465 yards passing Sept. 11.

Receiver Javon Green was the biggest benefactor of Moschetti's mastery of the Sooners. Green had a career-high 133 yards on three receptions. Marcus Stiggers also posed a receiving threat. The Buffs' senior wide out leads the squad with 17.6 yards per reception.

What does all this mean to a Wildcat secondary that leads the nation in pass-efficiency defense? Perhaps nothing. K-State has been airtight on pass coverage this season, only allowing three touchdowns and intercepting 15 passes through eight games. Nearly half of the picks came against Texas and Oklahoma State, two pass-oriented programs.

Something has to give Saturday afternoon. Don't expect any record-setting days from Moschetti and his receiving corps, but fans should expect a high-scoring affair between the two teams. K-State is second in the nation in scoring with a 41.5 points per game average and is the only team in the nation to score at least 35 points in every game. Expect this distinction to travel to Lincoln next week.

Jonathan Beasley should continue to solidify the Cats' passing game with a healthy mix of the running game and a Colorado pass defense that surrenders more than 200 yards a game.

Head coach Bill Snyder should rotate David Allen, Joe Hall and Frank Murphy as the featured back. This would keep Colorado's defense from adapting to one particular style of running, also freeing up the opportunity for screen passes to Allen and Hall and Murphy's inclusion in the passing game.

The five-team punching dummy that had frequented KSU Stadium will take a welcomed break on Saturday. Even if the score gets out of hand, don't expect Barnett to throw in the towel, although the Buffs' first-year coach hasn't lived up to his "return to dominance" campaign he promised before the season. Barnett will muster every trick play he possesses to close the gap against a program that resides where Colorado once did: in the conference driver seat.

Toss all of these ingredients into the purple pressure-cooker that is KSU Stadium, and fans should have a reason to stay for the entire contest. If not for the action, for the outside chance one of those guys on stilts humors everyone by losing his balance and crashing to the turf.

That's something worth the price of admission.

Running back merry-go-round

Fullback's injury spurs change in Wildcat backfield — again

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The merry-go-round cycle of who starts in the K-State offensive background, after slowing in recent weeks, will speed up against Colorado.

After suffering his second concussion of the season against Baylor last week, junior fullback Johnno Lazetich will not play against the Buffaloes, ending a two-game streak in which K-State had the same starting backfield.

With Lazetich out, K-State is must decide whether to return running back Joe Hall to fullback, where he started two games for the Wildcats earlier in the year, or start senior Ryan Payne, who has zero starts in his career.

No matter who will fill his shoes, it is certain Lazetich will be missed.

"He's one of those guys who's going to smash you in the mouth," junior quarterback Jonathan Beasley said. "He'll do whatever he can to make sure his guy is down on the ground.

"He makes everyone else more excited about playing and being out there."

Earlier in the season, Hall said he would rather play running back than fullback and that he wasn't as comfortable with being a lead blocker.

Head coach Bill Snyder mentioned several possible combinations K-State could use, among them a Payne, Hall backfield.

Junior David Allen said there won't be much of a drop off with Payne in the ball game.

"He's a good athlete, and he works just as hard as anybody else," Allen said.

The starting fullback isn't the only position up in the air. Snyder said during his Tuesday press conference that senior Frank Murphy is a possibility for this weekend.

If Murphy is able to play, the Wildcats will have three running backs who have started at least two games this year.

Whoever starts at running back isn't the most important thing to Allen.

"I don't think it's all about starting," Allen said. "I think it's all about who gets the job done.

"If you don't start and you come off the bench and get the job done, then that's a plus for your team."

The possibility of having three capable running backs is a bonus to the team, Allen said.

"If you've got two guys out there, and they're both doing what they're supposed to do and you're winning the game, then what more can you ask for?" Allen said.

Regardless of who has started in the backfield for the Wildcats, K-State has managed to put together a string of four consecutive 200-yard team rushing performances and has rushed for more than 190 yards in every game but one this year.

Each of the teams's backs has a different style, but the coaching staff and players say the play calling is the same.

"We basically run the same plays," Beasley said. "Joe's just more of a bruiser so it looks like we've changed up the plays."

With Lazetich out, K-State must decide whether to return running back Joe Hall to fullback, where he started two games earlier in the year, or to start senior Ryan Payne, who has zero starts in his career.

Even if the play calling stays the same, Beasley has to make adjustments when handing the ball to different players, especially Murphy.

"If Franks's back there, you have to be a step or two quicker," Beasley said.

When the offense faces off against Colorado, it will face a tougher defense than most expect, one that has began to learn a different defense installed by new head coach Gary Barnett.

"I think they've vastly improved from the beginning of the season," Snyder said.

Despite the Buffaloes' improvement, Allen said the key to winning the game lies with the Wildcats themselves.

"If we go out and play our game the way we've been playing," Allen said, "and take care of our business, we'll come out on top."

K-State running back Joe Hall dives past Baylor safety Sean Armistead (21) into the end zone in the first quarter of Saturday's game. Hall had a total of 109 yards on the Baylor defense.

K-State running back David Allen runs around Texas cornerback Ahmad Brooks as he makes his way into the end zone for a 35-yard touchdown run during the fourth quarter of this season's Texas game. Allen had 41 yards on six carries and had a 74-yard punt return for a touchdown in the game.

Safety Jarrod Cooper reaches out and pulls down Iowa State's Darren Davis as he tries to get outside on a run in the first half of the game in Ames, Iowa. Davis had 131 yards on 17 carries in the first half, which helped the Cyclones lead 28-7 going into halftime. In the second half, the Wildcat defense shut down Davis, allowing him only 21 yards on nine carries.

Cooper finds success with aggressive style of play

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"I like to hit people."

This has been junior strong safety Jarrod Cooper's philosophy every time he steps onto the football field.

And in his career at K-State, it's been working pretty well.

The 6-foot-1-inch, 210-lb. Cooper has recorded 55 total tackles this season, ranking him second on the Wildcat defense behind middle linebacker Mark Simoneau.

In the second game of the season this year, against UTEP, Cooper recorded a season-high 11 tackles. Cooper has had at least six tackles in all but two games this season.

The true items that set Cooper apart from the rest of the football scene are his explosive playing ability and distinctive personality, not to mention his variety of hairstyles.

When asked where Cooper gets his reckless abandonment style of play, he said, "I think it's more instinct than anything. It's more like an emotion kind of thing."

Cooper, who is majoring in social sciences, has been wreaking havoc on opposing defenses his entire career, verbally as well as physically.

Inevitably, Cooper takes it personally when the opposing team starts talking to him on the field.

"It's rude — there's no reason to be rude, and when you're out on the field you can do something about people being rude. Walking down the street — you might not be able to do anything, you might have to hold your tongue. But on the field you can be rude all you want, it's just going to come back to you — and get you blown up."

Aggressive behavior simply comes naturally to Cooper.

"That's all I do is hit people," he said. "Especially, I don't like wide receivers at all. They talk too much trash, and they think they're the bomb, so I really try to take shots at them."

Cooper said Simoneau has taught him a lot on how to play football mentally at the collegiate level.

"Simoneau taught me how to control being mad and just playing under control," Cooper said. "If you play out of control, you're going to get penalties galore like we used to."

Cooper's outstanding defense has earned him numerous postseason honors.

In 1998, he was named First-team All-Big 12 by the league coaches, The Associated Press and The Kansas City Star, second-team All-American by the Sporting News, and K-State's defensive MVP along with linebacker Jeff Kelly.

This year, he was chosen as team captain and team representative, as well as being named an All-America candidate for 1999.

"It puts a lot of pressure on me sometimes," Cooper said. "But the important thing is that nobody's greedy, and we all know that as long as we just keep winning ... We've all got good spirit and are positive about everything."

As a sophomore in '98, Cooper was third on the team with 86 tackles and ranked third in the Big 12 with three fumble recoveries. In the Big 12 Championship game against Texas A&M, he recorded a season-high 11 tackles, two tackles for loss, two passes broken up and one sack.

In his freshman year, Cooper was named second-team freshman All-American by The Sporting News and honorable-mention All-Big 12 by the league coaches. He finished third on the team with 79 tackles.

Cooper's first K-State start came in the fifth game of his freshman season against Missouri. Just four games later, he earned Big 12 defensive player of the week honors following a career-high 14 tackles against Kansas and a sack.

Out of Pearland (Texas) High School, Cooper was a second-team all-state selection and listed as the 16th best defensive back by BlueChip Illustrated in the Southwest Region in 1996.

"High school was more like a joke, kind of," he said. "We were just on a team to say we were on a team, and now it's like there's so much more to be involved with, like all my teammates.

"It means so much to the 50,000 people that are in here, not to mention all the people around the country. And to everybody on the team and the coaches and their wives and the kids — it means so much more. I'm not playing for fun anymore to just say I'm doing it — I'm playing because it means something."

Colorado is coming from an impressive 38-24 win at home against the high-powered passing offense of Oklahoma.

A key to that win and to a good showing against K-State is in the performance of quarterback Mike Moschetti. Last week, Moschetti completed 22 of 31 passes for 382 yards and four touchdowns as he picked apart of the Sooners' pass defense.

However, the Sooners didn't feature the top pass defense, as the Cats do. K-State's defensive unit is ranked overall at No. 3.Cooper made a few comments concerning what the Cats will do to contain Moschetti's arm.

"It'll be like the Texas game with what we did to (Major) Applewhite — hit them," Cooper said. "I have no problem hitting anybody, and neither does anyone on our defense. If you hit somebody enough, it's going to break them down."

That's an understatement. The Cats defense forced six turnovers against Applewhite, who threw three interceptions and lost three fumbles.

Snyder said the Buffs' offense can get confusing because of their number of different looks.

"There's diversity in their offense, created by formations. I think we charted something along the lines of 66 formations that they were able to get into."

Snyder said the number of formations creates problems for the defense.

"You always have to get yourself lined up correctly," he said. "That always creates concerns and problems — make sure that you have everybody covered and then you have to deal with their running and passing game."

Colorado has a number of weapons, too. Sophomore running back Cortlen Johnson, who has rushed for 652 yards, won't be active due to injury, but senior Dwayne Cherrington is expected to pick up the load. Cherrington has ran for 196 yards and one score, averaging 4 yards per carry.

The Buffs have a threat on special teams like that of K-State's David Allen. Ben Kelly averages nearly 31 yards per kick return, including two scores, plus two on punt returns.

"Their return teams on special teams have been excellent," Snyder said. "Kelly is a very dangerous runner. They do a great job blocking for him. That'll be a concern."

Making a return for the Cats is senior running back Frank Murphy, who has been sidelined for four games after having surgery on his left ankle for an injury he received during the Texas game Oct. 2.

Murphy will be in the mix of things at tailback with Allen and 290-pound junior Joe Hall.

In fact, Hall might be seeing some time at fullback with the absence of junior Johnno Lazetich, who suffered his second concussion of the season last week against Baylor.

Senior Ryan Payne should be the starter for the Cats at fullback, despite entering the game with no career starts.

Microsoft strives for settlement

By WILLIAM C. MANN
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The nation's top antitrust official said the government is looking at a full range of remedies to punish Microsoft following a judge's ruling that the software giant misused its monopoly powers.

Despite U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson's preliminary findings against Microsoft, however, both the government and the company expressed a willingness to consider an out-of-court settlement.

In an open letter, Microsoft Chairman, Bill Gates, said the company is committed to a fair and responsible resolution. The company's chief operating officer, Bob Herbold, said on the Sunday talk shows that "there's nothing we'd like more than to settle this case."

Assistant Attorney General Joel Klein, who also appeared on three TV programs, said, "Obviously settlement is always an option."

Neither Klein nor Herbold would suggest what an agreement might entail.

"We would need a settlement that deals with the very findings that the court made in this case, a settlement that produces consumer choice, innovation and competition in the market," Klein said on "Fox News Sunday."

He cited "serious issues here about law enforcement and the antitrust laws. And of course, if Microsoft were prepared to engage on those issues, we would be prepared as well."

In Gates' letter, which appeared as a full-page advertisement in The Washington Post, he wrote that "Microsoft is committed to resolving this matter in a fair and responsible manner, while ensuring that the fundamental principles of consumer benefit and innovation are protected."

"At the heart of this case," he said, "is whether a successful American company can continue to improve its products for the benefit of consumers."

The letter, addressed "To Our Customers, Partners and Shareholders," also appeared on Microsoft's Web site, dated Friday, the day Jackson released his ruling. It was similar to a statement Gates read on the same day.

Jackson, who presided over 77 days of testimony, declared in a remarkably blunt decision that Microsoft's aggressive use of its monopoly status stifled innovation and hurt consumers by limiting choices.

On ABC, Klein said Jackson's findings meant that Microsoft was able to control personal computers and control investment in that area.

"You know, in America you have a choice," Klein said. "And if IBM or Gateway or Compaq or Dell ... had choice, they could go to Microsoft and negotiate (or) they could go to somebody else and negotiate. Here, everybody's got to go to one place — that's what's hurting us."

He said both sides will submit to Jackson legal analyses of his findings, after which the judge will decide penalties, if any.

One penalty that he appeared to rule out is a fine. "Let me make clear we are not looking for any financial penalties," Klein said on CNN's "Late Edition." "We're concerned with competition. This is not a penal action, and we're not going to seek monies."

Nathan Price hands his dad, Ned Price, another case of Diet Pepsi to sell at the concession stand on the north side of KSU Stadium. The refreshment stand is sponsored by Boy Scout Pack 281 to help supplement its budget.

TV analyst to present talk today

■ ABC's Cokie Roberts to deliver Landon Lecture about election hype at 11:30 a.m. in McCain Auditorium.

By TRAVIS D. LENKER
Kansas State Collegian

Cokie Roberts knows it's early.

The 2000 presidential election is a year away, yet it's been attracting nationwide attention for months.

"It's forever early," Roberts said of the pre-election-year hype.

The political analyst for ABC News will speak about the race for the White House during her Landon Lecture today at 11:30 a.m. in McCain Auditorium.

ROBERTS

"The speech will be about where we're headed in 2000 and how we got there," Roberts said.

Her lecture is free and open to the public.

"The elections will be a year from Sunday, but I think we're going to make people think it's over," Roberts said Friday. "When you tell them it's time to go to the polls, they'll say, 'What? Isn't that done?'"

The 2000 election hype has started early for a few reasons, Roberts said. Many of next year's political primaries were scheduled early and bunched together, which forced candidates to start fund raising sooner.

There's not much going on in Congress, which turns more attention to next year's candidates.

Then there's Bill Clinton.

He wasn't impeached, but Roberts said the Monica Lewinsky debacle made America ready for a new leader.

"The destabilizing effect of throwing him out, particularly when things were going well, was nothing that appealed to people," Roberts said. "That didn't mean they were thrilled to see Bill Clinton sitting there, and once the threat of removing him was out of the way, it was almost as if they had psychologically removed him."

Roberts discusses the 2000 election and other political issues as co-host of "This Week with Sam Donaldson and Cokie Roberts" on Sunday mornings on ABC. Donaldson was a Landon speaker in 1997.

Roberts said Elizabeth Dole's decision to drop out of the Republican presidential race isn't due to a media bias against women, as Dole's husband, former Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., alleged in a speech here last month.

Service week activities start

■ Circle K International coordinates projects for benefit of community; opportunities to help still available.

By KELLY EVENSON
Kansas State Collegian

Community service is getting a boost from one campus organization this week.

K-State's chapter of Circle K International, the world's largest not-for-profit collegiate coed service organization, has planned a week of activities that benefit community organizations in conjunction with Community Service Awareness Week.

Karen Bowser, president of Circle K, said the week is a national event that members the opportunity to participate in one or more community service projects. Non-members also can participate by contacting Circle K.

"This week is an opportunity to show the campus and the surrounding community how important community service is," Bowser said. "It is also a time to give members a chance to be involved and partake in the activities the organization offers."

Community Service Awareness Week is designed so one project is completed each day. On Sunday, Circle K members chalked campus sidewalks to publicize the event. Today, members will be going to Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community to help the elderly; Tuesday involves projects with the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

On Wednesday, the group will be tutoring elementary students at the Douglass Center while on Thursday, Circle K will be cleaning the Durland Hall parking lot as part of the adopt-a-lot program on campus. On Friday, activities involve volunteering at the Wharton Manor Nursing Home, and Saturday, members will be joining with others from their division in St. Marys to do a joint service project and then watch the K-State vs. Nebraska game as a social activity.

K-State's chapter of Circle K is a part of the Kansas district and is also a member of the North Division, which includes the University of Kansas,

Stadium employees face angry fans, long hours on feet

STORY BY TANNER EHMKE

Angry football fans have christened them with countless names. Whatever the fans choose to call them, whether it's to their face or while they are escorted away, they keep checking tickets at football games. But being an usher is not as simple as it sounds

An usher

Adam Gerrond, freshman in criminology, is an usher at KSU Stadium. He shows up at the stadium three hours before the game wearing a pink shirt and black jeans, the required attire for ushers. After the game, he spends close to two hours at the stadium, picking up folding chairs from the north end zone. During the game, he stands. And he stands some more.

"Your feet don't hurt so bad if you have comfortable shoes on," Gerrond said. "But your legs get sore, and your back starts to hurt."

Gerrond checks tickets at the general-admission section in the stadium. His biggest problem is dealing with people trying to get into the section without the proper ticket.

"They want us to let them through anyway," Gerrond said. "When we don't, they get pissed and bark at us. It's usually because they have a friend they want to sit with during the game. And they all say they're just one person and it's not going to make a difference."

It's not ushers' intent to make people angry, he said. That doesn't stop the patrons from calling them names. They've usually been called "ticket Nazis," but that's not the worst of what he's been called, Gerrond said.

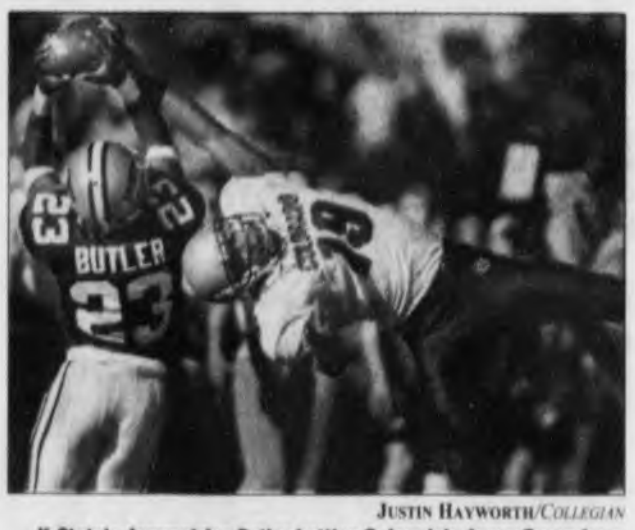
The fans can get pretty hostile at times, especially the drunken ones. They get really upset if their alcohol is taken away, he said.

"We haven't had anyone get violent so far," he said. "Not yet, anyway."

Gerrond has been reported to his supervisor twice for not allowing people without tickets to sit in the general-admission section. One woman insisted on sitting with her son in the section when she had bought a ticket for a different section. When she was denied her request, she reported him to his supervisor, who also did not allow her to sit in the wrong section.

Despite the disgruntled patrons, Gerrond said he still enjoys his job.

At the big games, fans give him high-fives and congratulate him on doing a good job. He has been invited to parties every week. One of the patrons invited him to a party with strippers after the game. Women even flirt with him at the games.



"Girls try to pick me up," he said. "But I can't go anywhere."

A supervisor

Robin Herman is Gerrond's supervisor. There are four supervisors at the stadium who help 35 to 40 ushers with their jobs to make things run smoothly.

"The ushers must be responsible,"

K-State's Jerametrius Butler battles Colorado's Javon Green for a pass late in the fourth quarter of Saturday's game at KSU Stadium.

Wildcats hold on to defeat Colorado at home, climb to No. 5 in both polls

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER

Head coach Bill Snyder called K-State's 20-14 victory over the Colorado Buffaloes on Saturday at KSU Stadium ugly.

When it looked as if No. 5 K-State was going to hold off the Buffs for the win, Colorado struck back with back-to-back touchdowns within a two-minute period.

Senior Colorado quarterback Mike Moschetti connected with junior receiver Javon Green on passing scores of 64 and 70 yards within the final six minutes of the game.

"We just weren't very good," Snyder said. "It would tell me that we weren't as prepared as we need to be.

"I thought it was pretty ugly."

Junior quarterback Jonathan Beasley was pulled to start the second half in favor of senior Adam Helm. In the first half, Beasley completed just four of 11 attempts for only 75 yards, 68 of which came on a touchdown score to junior Quincy Morgan late in the opening quarter.

Snyder said the switching of quarterbacks was just something he needed to do to generate some offense.

"It was just time for a change," Snyder said. "See if we

Most Kansans say children should face evolution tests

WICHITA — A strong majority of Kansans do not doubt God's hand in the creation of humans, but a majority also believes the state's schoolchildren should study evolution and be tested on it, according to a new poll.

The poll, conducted by The Wichita Eagle and the Kansas City Star, surveyed 604 respondents Oct. 22-26. The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

The survey found that far more people disagree than agree with the Kansas Board of Education's decision in August to eliminate testing on evolution.

The margins narrow when state residents are asked how God accomplished human creation and whether the theory of evolution should be taught in schools.

Bishop returns to Manhattan to attend game, talk with fans

BY TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Between 3,000 and 4,000 K-State fans stood in line at Kay Bee Toys at the Manhattan Town Center to meet the former K-State quarterback who led the football team to two of the greatest seasons in K-State history.

Michael Bishop, who now plays for the New England Patriots, was visiting Manhattan and attending the K-State vs. Colorado game.

"It was good going out to the game," Bishop said. "I miss being out on the field and playing with the team."

Despite a few letdowns in the game against Colorado, the team played well, he said. For the team to continue its success, it has to step on the field knowing it's going to win and play well, Bishop said.

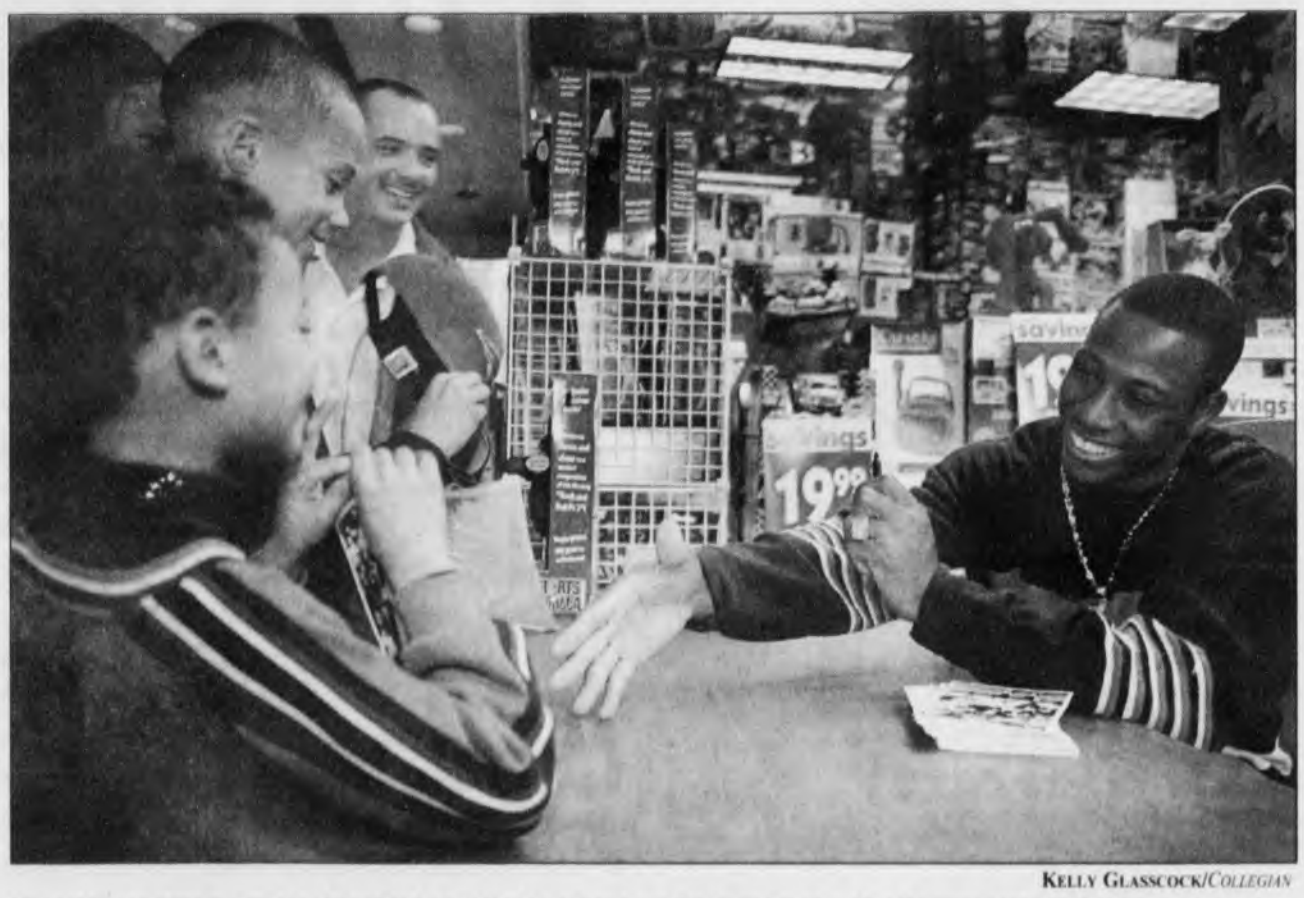
"They control their own destiny," he said. "Any doubts will upset the season."

Although he's traded his purple jersey in for a red, white and blue one, he still wears lucky number 7 with his new team. He said he had a few doubts when starting out, but is getting opportunities to play and improve.

Bishop autographed T-shirts, posters, calendars, photographs, footballs and football jerseys bearing his number for large crowd spanning all ages, many of whom were children.

Kogen Stacey and Ryan Hummel, 12-year-old students at Dwight D. Eisenhower Middle School, couldn't wait to meet him and tell all their friends at school about him. For them, it was like meeting a living legend.

"He's the best football player in the world," Stacey said.



Chris Flynn, sophomore in business marketing, and Megan Christensen, sophomore in art education, said they were impressed that Bishop traveled back to Manhattan on his weekend off to see the team and the fans.

"It's a real tribute to him as a person that he remembers his alma mater," Christensen said. "It shows he cares enough to come back."

Randy Crow, marketing assistant for Manhattan Town Center, helped coordinate the event. Close to 1,000 people arrived at Kay Bee Toys at 9:30 a.m. to meet Bishop, he said. Many more showed up after the game to get an autographed picture or to have him sign K-State memorabilia.

Bishop wanted a large fan base of children, Crow said. He thought Kay Bee Toys would be a great place to meet the fans and sign autographs.

"Everyone still loves and respects him," Crow said. "It's a great testimony to him, K-State football and the K-State fans."

India Student Association to present cultural show Sunday

■ Annual event to kick off with catered Indian meal, also feature music, dances.

BY JENNIFER KEHLER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan residents will have the opportunity to experience the culture of India within their own town on Sunday.

The K-State India Student Association will present its annual cultural show at the Manhattan High East Campus. This year's theme is "Rang Tarang," or Waves of Color.

Karthik Krishnakumar, graduate student in mechanical engineering and vice-president of the association, said the last cultural show of the millennium will begin with a catered meal of traditional Indian food.

During the dinner, Krishnakumar said, members of the association will present a variety of exhibits on Indian art forms, including music and Hendi design, as well as information about the national leaders of India and the Taj Mahal.

"They will explain the musical forms of India," Krishnakumar said, "and how musical instruments are played in a different manner for Indian music than for music of other countries."

The cultural show will begin at 7 p.m. in the auditorium and will consist of artistic performances by members of the association.

A skit depicting the lives of three K-State graduate students from India will give the audience personal insight into the cultural differences between the United States and India and the transition and lifestyle changes those students experience.

The traditional Indian dances that depict various elements of nature will also be performed. Vrushali Koranne, graduate student in computer science, said he choreographed dances for the show and will be participating in the presentation of the dances. One of the dances, Koranne said, is Rajastani, a cultural dance practiced in the state of Rajastan.

Cassie Hildebrand, junior in English and secondary education, attended the cultural show last year, and said the members of the association did an excellent job presenting the unique and interesting characteristics of their culture.

"The show is not only fun and interesting, but also extremely informative," Hildebrand said. "It is an opportunity to learn about another culture and to break down stereotypes that people might have about a certain country."

Ticket Info

The cultural presentations are free and open to the public.

Man accused of shootings in Hawaii remains in custody, pleads innocent

BY JEAN CHRISTENSEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HONOLULU — Byran Uyesugi was a model prisoner who ate heartily and slept restfully in the days following his arrest in the shooting deaths of seven Xerox Corp. coworkers, an officer assigned to watch over him said.

"He was very calm and acted as if he had just stolen a crayon in a store. It was really surprising," said the police officer, who spoke on condition of anonymity Saturday.

The 40-year-old copier repairman, accused in the worst mass murder in Hawaii history, remained jailed on $7 million bail after pleading innocent Friday to one count of first-degree murder and seven counts of second-degree murder.

Police believe Uyesugi entered the Xerox warehouse in Honolulu's industrial sector Tuesday and opened fire with a 9 mm handgun. He surrendered after a five-hour standoff with police about four miles from the warehouse.

Uyesugi was held until Friday at the Honolulu Police Department cellblock, a 53-cell underground holding facility. He since has been transferred to an Oahu prison.

While in police custody, the guard who watched over him said Uyesugi was a model prisoner who occasionally smiled and made small talk about a jammed door on his way to meet with detectives but never acted out in any fashion.

"He was a very, very polite, reserved individual," the officer said. "I'd expected him to be ranting, raving, crying. Even when the detective charged him and served him with his papers, he just kind of smirked, actually. He just said, 'Oh, whatever.'"

Uyesugi's lawyer, Jerel Fonseca, said his client has been responsive but "doesn't volunteer very much."

"He is very quiet at this point," Fonseca said Saturday.

Pepsi won contract; now win us over, too

Congratulations, PepsiCo Inc., for paying K-State $12 million and getting exclusive rights to sell your cola products here. You have a great opportunity to make loyal customers even more loyal to your product and to create new loyalties from students and faculty who in the past weren't partial to your soft drinks.

But to do that, you have to handle things just right, because many on campus weren't happy that K-State established an exclusive contract with your company. They wanted things to stay as they were, or they were loyalists of that other soft-drink giant.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

You've taken a step in the direction of changing those loyalties by retaining Vending Services employees and making them employees of your company. Now don't blow it all by raising Pepsi prices after a three-year moratorium on price increases ends.

You are a business, and to another demographic group, charging more would be understandable. However, students are a poor lot. Raising prices when the moratorium ends will alienate us and, even worse, might make us Coke drinkers out of spite. So, play things smart. Keep prices low and make loyal customers of us all.

Forgiveness of vicious crime shows how far society still must go

VIEWPOINT

KEN WELLS

You remember playground rules.

I don't mean kickball etiquette, or where the goals were when you played soccer in the outfield of the baseball field. I mean the simple, vicious cycle of kindergarten karma: You give, you're gonna get — maybe not today, maybe not tomorrow, but what goes around … It wasn't an implied threat; it just was a law of physics.

The aspect of this that amazes me in retrospect was the kind of silent understanding that surrounded the ritual. We seemed to accept it, when, two days after tripping someone in the hall, we got caught by a flying elbow during recess. "Oh, OK, I remember why THAT happened," we'd say, dust ourselves off, and get right back in the game, as if we'd just been handed a receipt. Price paid, thank you, drive through.

Maybe this is indicative of my level of emotional maturity more than anything else, but it's scary how long this has still been in play in my head, this second-grade Code of Hammurabi burned into my brain like a Microsoft operating system (and just about as reliable). Forget a slight? Like hell. Don't forgive, never forget, just remember. Remember, and wait.

The sad thing is, I've always had a quasi-rational underpinning to this religious grudge-toting. It's pretty close to a spiritual feeling that, if nothing else, the universe is a constantly fluxing system of balances, of give and take, of disruptions and harmonies. I've watched with surprising regularity as the evil in our lives gets balanced with the good, though rarely all at once — it's often just a matter of time. The universe seems to handle it for us, at its own leisurely pace. I get satisfaction watching the same car that's cut off three people in traffic get pulled over — and I love watching the facial contortions of the driver. It doesn't happen every time, but often enough to keep faith alive, faith that this universe keeps itself under control.

But that's such a passive attitude, isn't it?

I believed in keeping the balance. I believed if someone wasn't going to get their comeuppance from anyone else but me, well, then, I guess I was meant to dish it out. And if you did do wrong by me, you were damned well going to get it back from me. No matter what. This wasn't bitterness, this was a moral imperative. It just led to bitterness. You can keep this perspective only so long before becoming hopelessly twisted.

I'll leave it up for my acquaintances to decide among themselves when that twisting happened to me. (Already I hear someone in Ohio yelling, "Birth! Birth!") It took a complete personal crisis and mental meltdown before I accepted the fact that, yeah, some karma was gonna slip through the cracks on my watch. Vengeful perfectionism shatters. Wasn't a pretty picture.

And if you've been on a date where your companion insisted on picking up the tab (or machinated it so that you couldn't possibly repay them), you know that feeling, that feeling that you owe something, that feeling you just can't shake off or scrub from your hands, that taint of debt. But it can be survived, if you have the faith that it's not your responsibility, that you're part of a larger whole, not all of which works against you in concert — despite my documented evidence to the contrary. If you believe that it does come around, that someone else on that playground would deliver the elbow for you, then there's no need to exert yourself.

This philosophical change has been both slow and, sadly, incomplete. I haven't quite graduated to forgiveness, yet, so I've got 20-odd years of napalmed bridges that aren't getting put back up any day soon. And I still subscribe to the balance theory and my role in it. But every once in a while, whether I like it or not, it seems, a particle of mercy creeps in. I can't describe that feeling, that touch of God when I make eye contact and I'm thinking, "Yeah, you got me, but I'll let this one slide — just so long as you know it only means someone else's picking up this tab, m'friend." It's a small weight lifted, but you can still feel it.

And I have so far to go.

After their son met a brutal and vicious death at the hands of some alleged human beings, Dennis and Judy Shepard intervened during the sentencing of one of the killers, sparing the life of one of the vermin who pistol-whipped their child. It was their words that helped persuade prosecutors to deal two consecutive life sentences to Aaron McKinney, words such as those Dennis Shepard used in court to describe the enormity of the Shepards' gift: "I give you life in the memory of one who no longer lives."

If that were my son — if that were even my friend tied to a fence — broken and bleeding, I would not, I could not be so generous. I couldn't ignore that whisper in my mind to extract my own revenge through whatever means necessary. I couldn't ignore the rationality numbing, score-keeping drive for vengeance that has damned so much of our planet to perpetuating cycles of bloodletting. I'm just not there yet.

The Shepards, in their pain and grief and loss, have found something worth keeping. "I would like nothing better than to see you die, Mr. McKinney," Dennis Shepard said. "However, this is the time to begin the healing process. To show mercy to someone who refused to show any mercy. To use this as the first step in my own closure about losing Matt."

And here I think I've come so far to look beyond a social slight. I — we've got a long, long way to go.

And I'm running out of time.

Project Wellness aims to alter K-State social norms

GUEST VIEWPOINT

DOUG NEWTON

By now, many of you have heard about Project Wellness. You might be interested in knowing more about it.

The Kansas Health Foundation is funding Project Wellness for four years to conduct a social norms media campaign. This social-norms approach to reduce heavy drinking and associated harm on college campuses has been successful at several universities across the nation. For example, Northern Illinois University has experienced a 44-percent decrease in heavy drinking on its campus in more than nine years. The University of Arizona has had a 28-percent decrease in three years, and the University of Missouri had a 16-percent decrease after one year.

It works because social norms, whether actual or perceived, are potent shapers of human behavior. Regarding alcohol use on college campuses, students tend to overestimate the percentage of their peers who are heavy drinkers and underestimate the percentage of their peers who are moderate drinkers.

If students perceive heavy drinking and drunken behavior are more common and acceptable than they actually are, they will tend toward this kind of behavior. Conversely, if students become aware of the actual moderate and safer drinking practices of their peers, they will tend toward this type of behavior.

Compared with heavy drinkers, moderate drinkers are more likely, for example, to have more positive social relationships, achieve better grades and be safer when partying.

Therefore, the purpose of the project is to inform K-State students about the actual drinking behavior of the K-State student body, so their behavior is not influenced by inaccurate perception, but based on fact.

What is the actual drinking behavior of most K-State students? The typical student drinks moderately, if at all, and knows how to protect himself or herself from alcohol-related harm.

K-State students themselves are the authors of the information we are presenting. In spring 1999, the Project Wellness staff administered an anonymous and voluntary survey in classrooms to a sample of 1,297 K-State students. The sample was proportionately representative of the student body with respect to gender, year in school, college, age and grade point average. The sample included students who lived in residence halls, apartments or houses, and greek houses.

In the survey, students were asked to respond to questions about their drinking behaviors and about what they believe to be the drinking behaviors of most K-State students. The goal of the project simply is to provide students with the information they gave us in the survey. It reveals a discrepancy between what students report about their drinking behavior and what students perceive to be the norm on campus.

The results are interesting. For example, 61 percent of K-State students report they actually have five or fewer drinks when they party. They believe only 31 percent of K-State students have that same behavior.

Basically, students report drinking a considerably lower amount than they believe most K-State students are drinking. Also, most students report they party zero-to-one nights a week, whereas they believe most K-State students party three or four nights a week. Thus, the majority of students report they party considerably less frequently than what they believe is the norm on campus. These results indicate that most K-State students drink moderately, if at all.

The K-State survey findings are remarkably similar to those of other universities and colleges implementing social norms programs on their campuses. These include Michigan State University, Virginia Commonwealth University, University of Iowa, Dartmouth College and the University of North Carolina.

So who runs Project Wellness? I coordinate the project and am assisted by a campuswide advisory task force of 27 students, faculty and staff. There also is a core group of advisers that includes the director of University Counseling Services, the director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services, a professor of psychology and a professor of journalism and mass communications.

Most K-State students have safer and healthier drinking behaviors than they perceive to be the case on campus. This is good news! K-State students basically are a healthy population that has the ability to make good choices and avoid harm when it comes to alcohol use.

Doug is the Project Wellness coordinator. You can e-mail him at dougn@ksu.edu.

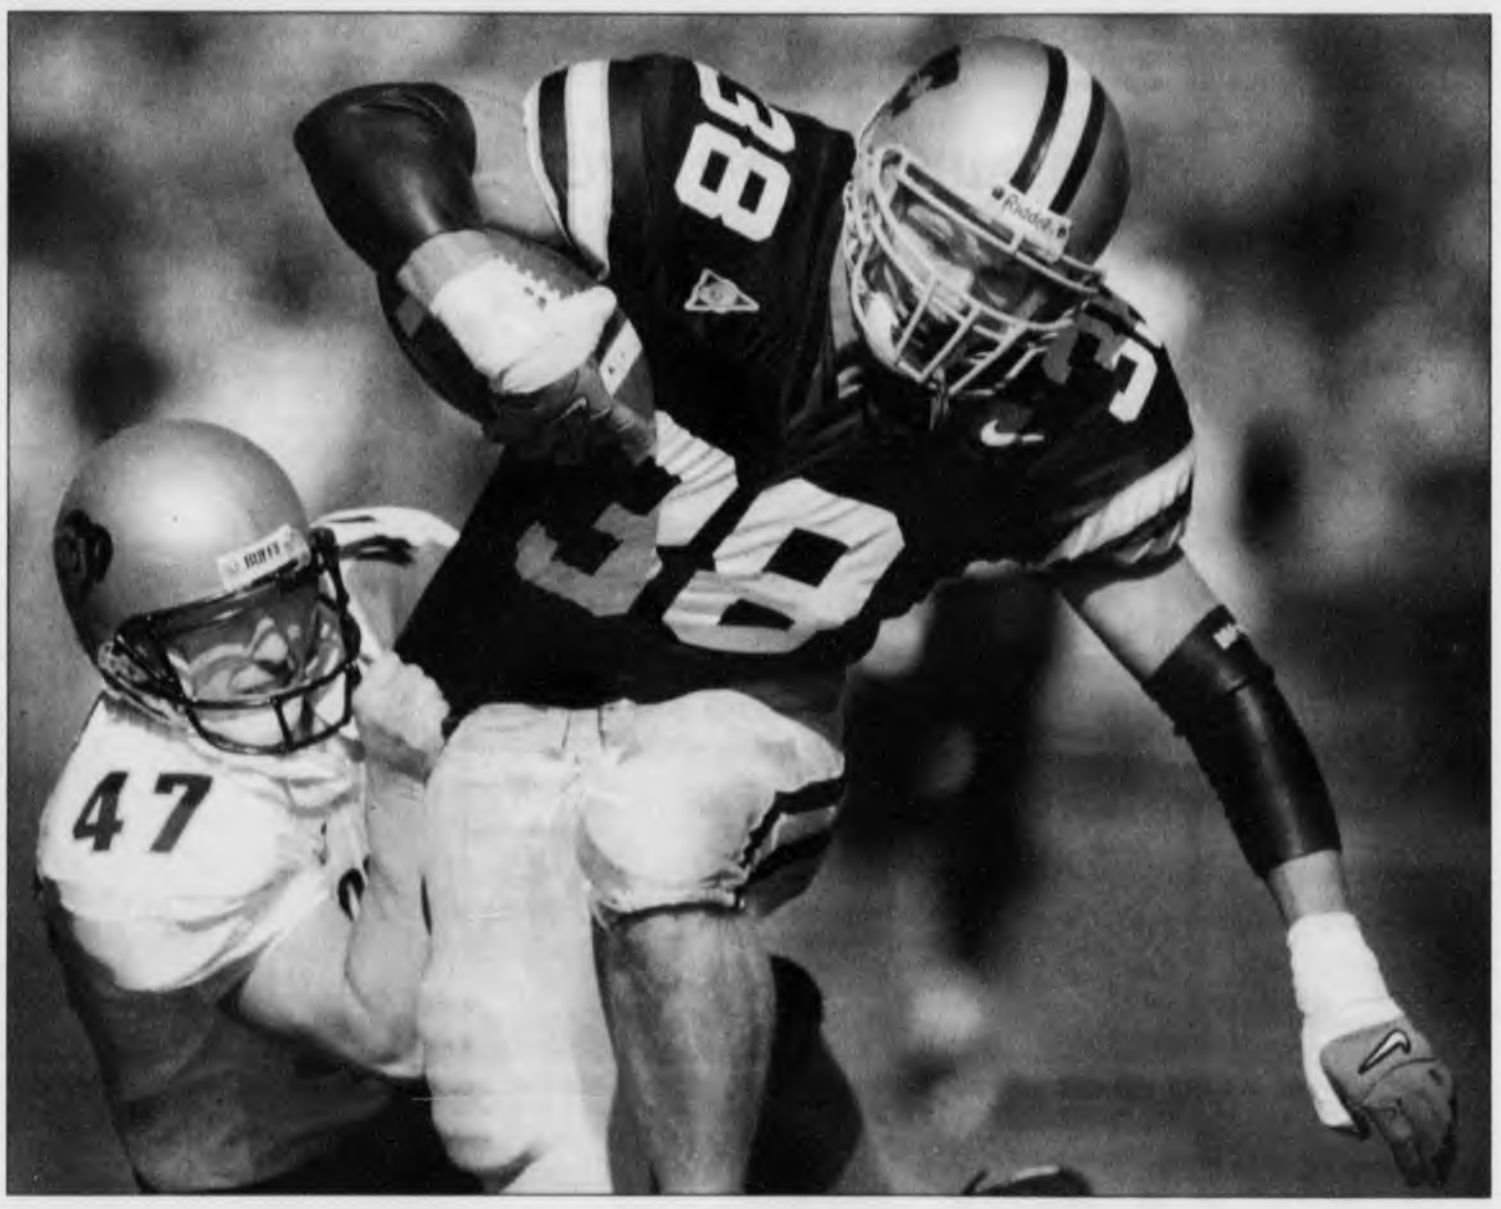
Collumnist needs to be aware of Bible's contents, vulgarity

Editor,

I would just like to comment on the sheer ignorance Scott Roney showed in his column Friday regarding biblical Christianity. Now, I am sure every word Roney said was sincere and in his heart, he is absolutely sure he is correct. But obviously Roney needs to reread the book that he touts so highly.

The Bible is full of stories of sheer lunacy and vulgarity. I could list hundreds, but because this is meant to be a short letter, I will mention merely one. Read Numbers, chapter 31. Personally, I think any existing God would be good. I think that murder, rape and slavery are not good. In fact, they are very horrible. The biblical God ordered slavery, condoned murder and the sexual ownership of virgins by his people. Yeah, the biblical God definitely is pure love, and I am the magic cheese fairy, prancing around and hypnotizing everyone into high levels of personal elation.



The above example of biblical vulgarity is just that — an example. It is not an exception to rule, but rather the way a good portion of the Bible is structured. Roney, I challenge you and all Christians to read your Bible critically and thoroughly. You might be shocked at just how many parts of it are unloving.

K-State's Jon McGraw is pulled down inside the 5-yard line by Colorado punter Nick Pietsch after picking up a punt that was blocked by Adrian Beard in the second quarter of Saturday's game. The blocked punt set up Joe Hall's 3-yard touchdown that gave the Wildcats a 14-0 lead.

could get something going."

K-State's offense appeared to be in need of a jump-start, as it seemed to be at its worst Saturday, totaling just 197 yards, 17 yards less than Colorado. Of K-State's five first downs in the first half, three were via penalties, and the other two came on touchdowns.

The decision posed questions about Beasley's play next week against No. 7 Nebraska. Snyder said Beasley has no option except to play well.

"He has no choice," Snyder said.

Helm said K-State needs to develop long drives, something the Cats haven't been accustomed to. So far this year, K-State has shown it lives and dies by the big-play offense. Beasley, in fact, leads the nation in yards per completion, at 18.8.

"Sometimes we just can't find a jelling-type aspect that we can sustain drives, and that's what we need to do," Helm said. "Sometimes we're three and out and need to work on our drives.

"We need to get more drives. You can't always depend on the big plays, and that happened today. We made a big play early and never really did anything else."

K-State's defense came up big several times in the contest. In the last stages of the second quarter, the Cats sacked Moschetti on consecutive possessions, both on third down. Following the second sack on third down, junior Adrian Beard blocked the Colorado punt, which was recovered by sophomore Jon McGraw on the 12-yard line with just 1:20 left in the half.

Snyder said they originally designed the play to be a punt block, but Beard and Brice Libel planned out their strategy on how they were going to do that.

"It was a little of both," Snyder said. 'We were attempting to block it, and he and Brice together coordinated about how they were going to do it. It was really a great play, and very significant — obviously — in the ball game.

"I like those guys. They take such pride in doing that. Adrian doesn't get on the field a whole lot. Brice doesn't get on the field a whole lot. It's guys like that that give you a chance. They show up big when the time comes."

K-State's mishaps on offense were fostered by a stingy Colorado defense. Snyder said the Buffs probably played the best defense against his team this year.

"I think so," Snyder said. "It would seem to be. I would have to go back and think about it, but I think they played as well against us defensively as any football team."

Late in the fourth quarter, the announcer informed the fans that then-No. 2 Penn State had been beaten by Minnesota. Not only did the fans hear it, the Cats did also. Despite that, Snyder refused to say it had any bearing on the outcome of the game. The same question arose after last season's Big 12 Championship game when it was announced that then-unbeaten UCLA had been defeated by Miami, and K-State followed the announcement by relinquishing their lead before the eventual loss.

"I heard that, but, you know, you're 20 years old, and you ought to be able to handle that kind of stuff," he said. "And still to this day, I don't want to revisit that, but I don't believe that had any impact December. 6 or today."

With the Huskers looming, senior Frank Murphy, who made his return by rushing seven times for three yards, said K-State actually may have let up against Colorado, but against Nebraska, they can't do it and expect to win the game.

"We probably let up a little bit," Murphy said. "That's something we can't do. We know what we have to do next week if we want to win, and so we know we're going to come back Monday and practice harder than we ever have and get ready to go."

K-State extended its consecutive games with an interception to 17 games. Senior Lamar Chapman added two interceptions, while McGraw added one.

Defense continues dominance of opposition

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 3 K-State defense has been wreaking havoc on opposing offenses all season. Against Colorado on Saturday, the Buffaloes received much of the same treatment.

Heading into the game, Colorado had been averaging more than 430 yards per game of total offense.

The Wildcats held the Buffaloes to 214 total yards, with much of the yardage coming on two big plays in the fourth quarter — touchdown passes of 64 and 70 yards. Without those plays, K-State would have held Colorado to only 80 yards of offense.

Head coach Bill Snyder said the team had its best defensive performance of the season, with the exception of the two big plays they allowed.

"I hadn't thought about it that way, but now that I do, it is a correct thought," he said. "One of the passes was one-on-one and their guy did a better job than ours. The other was an 8-yard pass where we missed some tackles and didn't do the job defensively."

For the game, K-State's defense allowed only

Women's basketball team to make season debut tonight at home

BY SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Wildcat women's basketball team will make its debut tonight at 7 in an exhibition game at Bramlage Coliseum against a Lithuanian traveling team.

The Cats take the court with little knowledge of the team they play — the Lithuanians have played two Big 12 teams, with a significant loss to Nebraska and a close loss to Iowa State.

"I think they've demonstrated an ability to play high-quality basketball," head coach Deb Patterson said. "It will be very interesting to see which team takes the floor against us. We don't have any specifics relative to their style of play, so this won't be an extensively scouted game on our part."

Patterson said the game gives her an opportunity to evaluate her team thus far. As of Friday night, she had not determined the starting lineup, but she said starters definitely would include junior point guard April Sailors and senior guard Jenny Coalson.

"This year, when I'm evaluating our starting lineup, it's not with any great pressure in mind to find five players who can prove themselves," Patterson said. "It's about finding people who can play together and finding a good rotation."

The Cats will rotate the post among three seniors — Nicky Ramage, Olga Firsova and Angie Finkes. Ramage said she expects the team to do well and feels ready to take the court.

"I think we're way ahead of schedule right now from where we were last year, on plays and stuff like that," Ramage said. "I'm really excited to get out there and play with these new people. I'm just going to go out there and play hard, and play the best I can."

Although the players hope for success, Patterson said the game is more about preparing for the season.

"It really is a strong positive opportunity to test yourself against an opponent you're unfamiliar with," Patterson said. "It just gives you that all-valuable initial game experience without all kinds of pressure on your back.

"It provides you an opportunity at a much higher level than practice to get into a rhythm and flow — just a fresh competitive experience after several months without that."

For some of the players, this will be the first game with a Division I basketball team. Finkes said the younger players have proven their ability to play with the team in practice.

"The younger players are doing great," Finkes said. "When you come in as a freshman into a league like this, with the expectations that are put on them, especially this team, they're just doing great. They're holding their own."

The Cats return two medical redshirts this season, Coalson and sophomore guard Dee DeShay. Patterson said Coalson's start will be a big moment for the team.

"Jenny Coalson, she hasn't played since the Ohio State game of last year, which I believe was in November," Patterson said. "For the rest of them, it's been since March, so obviously it's a real terrific moment for Jenny Coalson.

"For the rest of us, I think it's just about establishing execution on both ends of the floor and working through rough spots."

PA announcer should cease reading scores

■ Saturday's close call rekindles memories of Big 12 Championship.

Message to guy who talks over loud speaker at K-State football games:

Dear guy who talks over loud speaker at K-State football games.

Your name is Ivan, right? Ivan, how are you doing? I just wanted to let you know that you do a real good job at the games. You have a nice, pleasant voice, and your diction is superb. Best of all, you are friendly, and friendly is a good thing. When you say, "And be safe on your way home," at the end of the games, I make sure to obey every traffic law as soon as I get in my car. But, if you don't mind, I would like to point out just one little thing. Just one small thing. If it is at all possible, could you please stop announcing the scores during the game? Because when you do that in important games, only bad things happen.

Everyone remembers what happened in the Big 12 Championship game last year. I know these memories bring up bad karma, but it's my job to bring out the truth.

K-State was giving Texas A&M a good Texas-style thrashing in the first half of K-State's 36-33 overtime loss last season. Players were happy; fans were giddy. A national championship berth was on the horizon. The TWA dome in St. Louis felt like Disney World.

Then the announcer was getting lonely and decided to share with the audience.

"Ladies and Gentleman, UCLA has been upset by Miami." The score flashed on the scoreboard and the crowd erupted. The events that ensued, though, have brought nightmares to Wildcat faithful ever since.

Well, everyone knows what happened next. The Wildcats gave up a 15-point lead in the fourth quarter to deflate their national championship dreams.

The question remains, did the announcement of that game affect the outcome?

Former K-State linebacker Travis Ochs said no outside force caused the Wildcats to lose. They just slowly blew the lead.

"We had a lot of opportunities," Ochs said. "We just slowly pissed the game away. When it comes down to it, we lost."

Snyder, of course, refused to admit that his players lost sight of the game at hand and were not focused on playing in the national title game.

"It was a motivational lift for our players, not a letdown at all," Snyder said of the announcement of UCLA's defeat. "It was left in our hands. So many things could have happened."

Just when the purple fanatics were getting over the nightmare, the same scenario almost happened again. Almost.

K-State was hanging on to a solid 20-0 lead over Colorado in the fourth quarter. Then, all of the sudden, history nearly repeated itself and the stuff hit the fan.

The Wildcat defense played a near perfect game before Colorado quarterback Mike Moschetti decided finally to play well. He dropped back with 6:33 to go and unleashed a 64-yard touchdown bomb to make the score at 20-7.

No problem. Big deal. The K-State defense will hold him again, and the Cats will preserve the victory, right? Wrong.

It was at that moment the announcer started to get lonely again. He really just had to talk. He probably felt bad about the touchdown, so he wanted the crowd to feel better, so he released the scores of other games.

"Ladies and gentleman, Minnesota beats Penn State," he informed the fans. The crowd was happy again. Once again, everyone in that stadium was thinking about national glory, not winning the game. What happened next was nearly catastrophic.

Moschetti found Green again, this time for a 70-yard jaunt. K-State 20, Colorado 14. It was all happening again. Déjà vu all over again.

I was on the sidelines thinking, "Damn, don't let this happen again."

Defensive end Monty Beisel felt the same way.

"It was déjà vu," Beisel said. "It was so much like last year, it's scary."

Scary is exactly it. But this time the Wildcats were more focused. They had been through this ordeal before. They knew they could not let it happen again. And they didn't.

Jerametrius Butler played the savior and deflected another long Moschetti pass to Javon Green with 1:30 to go.

After the victory, Snyder held true to his beliefs when he heard the announcement.

"I heard that, but, you know, you're 20 years old, and you ought to be able to handle that kind of stuff," he said. "And still to this day, I don't want to revisit that, but I don't believe that had any impact December 6 or today."

I'm sorry, Bill, but just this once I have to disagree. These players are amazing athletes who no doubt want a national championship. But, most of all, they are human.

They are not computers. They have feelings, and it is easy to see how they can get caught up emotionally in the game and overlook an opponent. We all do things like that.

Whether it was the announcement of the rushing yards on 25 carries. Senior linebacker Mark Simoneau said it was the best rush defense the Wildcats have played all season.

"We got after them in a lot of phases of the game," he said. "It was just a good game overall, minus the two big plays."

There were several key defensive junctures throughout the ball game for the Wildcats.

Senior free safety Lamar Chapman set the stage on the game's third play. Colorado quarterback Mike Moschetti dropped back in the pocket and threw the slant across the middle. Chapman came across the field and leveled the Colorado receiver as the ball arrived, breaking up the play.

"I think I am playing as well as I've ever had here at Kansas State," Chapman said. "Coach [Phil] Bennett just put me in the right positions to make big plays."

On Colorado's third possession of the first quarter, Chapman intercepted a Moschetti pass to mark K-State's 17th straight game with an interception.

Junior Jon McGraw also added an interception on Colorado's first drive of the second quarter.

At the end of the first half, K-State's defense held Colorado to 34 yards of total offense on 28 plays.

In the Buffaloes' third play of the third quarter, Moschetti was intercepted again by Chapman, who stepped in front of the receiver in the flat and returned the interception 21 yards to the Colorado 30 yard-line, setting up a 20-yard field goal by junior Jamie Rheem, to put K-State ahead 17-0.

Aside from the three interceptions, the defense combined for five sacks for a total loss of 36 yards. Simoneau and junior defensive end Monty Beisel each had two sacks.

Snyder said the defense did a good job of containing Moschetti and putting pressure on him throughout the game.

"If you're going to blitz him, you'd better keep him confined," Snyder said. "If you let him out on the edge, he can run you ragged. When we pressured him, we were fine."

The Wildcats' front-seven was, once again, anchored by Simoneau, who recorded a season-high 12 tackles, including four for losses.

"I think he really stepped up and played well," Beisel said. "He led the team today. He's an emotional leader and went out there and played real physical."

score or the player's lack of focus, the Wildcats cannot be distracted.

This long season has been filled with too many close calls, close calls that easily could have gone the other way.

As the players are fully aware, if you make one mistake, it's over.

Against Nebraska and other opponents, the Wildcats can not afford to let these nightmares resurface.

They can't lose sight of the task at hand and they can't give up a 20-point lead.

Because the next déjà vu incident might not be as friendly.

Win against Chiefs gives 6-2 Colts best start since 1977

By STEVE HERMAN
The Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS — The Indianapolis Colts reached the midway point of the season as one of the surprise teams in the NFL, even to their coach.

Peyton Manning passed for 290 yards, extended his streak of touchdown passes to 21 games and scored on a 7-yard scramble early in the fourth quarter, giving the Colts a 25-17 victory over the Kansas City Chiefs on Sunday.

It was the fourth straight victory for the Colts (6-2), off to their best start since the then-Baltimore Colts opened 9-1 in 1977. They already have as many victories as the past two years combined.

"If you had asked me if this team could be 6-2, I'd have said it would be really tough," Coach Jim Mora said. "I think 6-2 realistically would be beyond anybody's expectations. But I'll take it."

Kansas City (5-3) set up the go-ahead Indianapolis touchdown when Larry Parker fumbled a punt return and Tito Wooten recovered at the Colts 46-yard line early in the fourth period. Rookie Edgerrin James, who rushed for 109 yards, carried 27 yards on the next play and caught a 21-yard pass three plays later to the Chiefs 10.

Manning ran 3 yards and then put the Colts up 22-17 with his 7-yard touchdown run.

MILLENNIAL MESSAGE

RAGE AGAINST THE MACHINE

Lyrics in new album force listeners to question society

BY SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rage Against the Machine's new album, "The Battle of Los Angeles," provides a new rendition of the classic Rage sound, integrating electronic sound with familiar bass and guitar.

The lyrics force the listener to question society with a distinct message of revolution. The first song, "Testify," is reminiscent of "Killing in the Name" but with new variations and a new message. Zack de la Rocha says, "Yes tha car is our wheelchair," and the song closes with, "Who controls the present now?"

Distinct throughout the album are the band's stalwart political views, particularly with regards to the political prisoner Mumia Abu Jamal.

The second song, "Guerrilla Radio," combines talk of Jamal and Gore at the same time, all the while urging the listener to turn it up — both lyrically and by the upbeat sound.

The third song slows down with subtle electronic sound and begins to present thoughts of revolution with lines like, "Hope lies in tha smoldering rubble of empires."

Although the lyrics are typical of Rage in that they urge change and political action, they have a new, millennium-steered message. In the final song, "War Within a Breath," Rocha encourages the listener to think about the upcoming potentiality for change. "Everything can change on a New Year's Day, as everything changed on New Year's Day."

Music Review

OUT OF 5

Rage Against the Machine

"The Battle of Los Angeles"

But the sounds of the album, though distinctively Rage, are different from what they already have produced. At times, the guitar sounds a little like Cream, other times like Portishead, even a little like Sonic Youth. In one song it picks up an Irish bagpipe tune, but it's definitely not bagpipes playing.

Rage creates a new sound with this album, as often the sounds are less caustic than earlier Rage, but at the same time, it is recognizably Rocha and his crew.

Any listener of classic rock can appreciate this album on two levels: the music and the message. The sound is upbeat but angry, perfectly fitting for the message, best summed up by the title of track nine: "Voice of the Voiceless."

This is what Rage always has been about and will continue to be, but, as Rocha sings in one of the best examples of the album, "Ashes in the Fall," "This is tha new sound, just like tha old sound, just like tha noose wound over the new ground."

This song not only reflects upon itself lyrically, but literally plays the new sound, starting out with soft computer sounds soon joined by the strong bass line and drums that are intrinsic in Rage.

The band has not attempted to remake itself by any means, or to shock the listener; instead, it just keeps going in different directions, both lyrically and with new effects, maintaining its momentum without doing anything drastic.

Probably the best song on the album is "Born as Ghosts," which picks up from the prior song with a faster beat with constant drums and a computer altered bass line — a new twist, but definitely Rage.

The song "Maria" pulls together the new sound with creepy electronic effects and a fast bass line, but Rocha reminds the listeners what Rage can do when he sets the pace for the song with his voice, not with drums.

Rage again has brought to the public an album that is listenable by sound and through the quality of the music forces fans, once again, to think about issues around the world and urge them to action.

The Rage fan definitely will appreciate this album, while the rest of the world can do so, too — it's excellent music, original sound and definitely not trite lyrics.

Comedy displays humorous, bittersweet marital issues

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE AND JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Neil Simon's early family life soon will be presented, in all its comedic details, at the Manhattan Arts Center when the center presents "Broadway Bound," a comedy opening Friday.

A small family in 1949 Brooklyn is the focus of the play, and at the center of the family is Eugene, one of the children; since the play is semi-autobiographical, Eugene is the alter-personality of the famous playwright.

Shel Edelman, who plays the part of Ben, Eugene's grandfather, said Simon recently has focused on bringing his life to the stage.

"Over the last 10 or 12 years, Neil Simon has written three plays that are semi-autobiographical," Edelman said.

Sheila Hochhauser, producer of the production, said the play also details Eugene's initial interest in performing.

"The play takes place as Eugene and his brother break into show business and TV, which was a new thing in 1949," Hochhauser said.

She said the aspects of Eugene's family, made up of six main characters, make the play all the more entertaining.

"I think the family configuration is pretty accurate," she said.

"The play depicts family life in all its ups and downs.

"The father and mother have some conflicts, and the brothers have some conflicts. The dynamics of the family are both funny and bittersweet."

Edelman said the play's more dramatic moments center around Eugene's parents.

"It's really about the breakup of the marriage between his parents," he said. "There are some funny lines, but also some pretty serious stuff."

Hochhauser said the cast and crew is a good balance between K-State students and community members.

"It's a true mix. We even have a couple of Army guys doing crew work," she said.

Hochhauser also said the recruitment for actors and crew members for this production had been going on as early as August.

"The arts center had an open house earlier this semester," she said. "We got a lot of people signed up at that point. Many people in this show were found at the open house, in fact."

Simon's skills as a playwright are obvious in this play, she said.

"Simon has a real rapid-fire way of putting lines together. The way his lines are delivered to express interaction between characters is wonderful," Hochhauser said.

When the curtain rises this weekend, Hochhauser said the hard work of the actors and crew will make the play a memorable one.

"My favorite part of this has been seeing how all of this is coming together," she said. "I just love how everyone is working together, and how it ultimately fits. You get the stage lights on opening night and there's no feeling like it, even if you're not right there on the stage."

Edelman said he thinks this play is more enjoyable than others he has experienced.

"This is a much better constructed play," he said.

Edelman said, as with most plays in which he is involved, becoming emotionally involved with the characters helps put more passion into his productions.

"Becoming another person helps me with my work. I really have to become that person, and it happens that way with every play I've done," he said.

"When I'm done with 'Broadway Bound,' I'll feel renewed."

The production runs Friday through Sunday and Nov. 18-21.

Herman said. "They also have to be flexible in different situations that arise."

Fake tickets and drunken patrons tend to be the most common problems ushers have to deal with, she said. But there are other problems that arise.

The big games are the most stressful because the crowd is more excited, Herman said.

At one game, a woman passed out and needed medical attention. The crowd and the medical staff were very cooperative in helping her, she said.

"I just try to stay on top of things," she said.

Getting people in their proper seats can be very stressful. The ICAT section is always trying to sit in the general admission section, Herman said.

"We just try to help people get their seats," she said. "Things get complicated when GA gets really crowded."

But Herman still has fun with her job.

"I love the atmosphere and the people I work with," Herman said. "The fans make it a lot of fun."

Ticket taker, parking cashier

Nichole Starns, freshman in pre-medicine, is a ticket-taker at the front gate. But tickets are all she's going to take.

"People try to sneak by me because I'm little, and they think I won't stop them," Starns said. "About once every other game I have to call security."

Starns said she doesn't think her job is stressful, though. She said she enjoys the people she works with and the excitement of the game and the crowd, especially the drunken people who come through the gates.

"They are really fun to watch," Starns said. "But they get really pissed off if you take their alcohol or won't let them bring it into the game."

Her cousin, Jennifer Starns, freshman in pre-medicine, is a parking cashier at the gate to the parking lot. Jennifer enjoys the luxuries of free food from friendly tailgaters and gets paid to watch the game after the parking lot is full.

However, her job can be threatening at times.

"People try to speed through the gate without paying," Jennifer said. "We usually get their license plate, but sometimes they get away."

One incident at the gate her feeling a little run down: a large truck tried to squeeze through the gate after receiving its parking permit, but pushed Jennifer in the back and ran over her foot. The truck's tire left tread marks on her heel.

"It really didn't hurt," Jennifer said.

Despite the number of hours each employee puts in, the work seems worth it.

"It's not just about getting paid," Gerrond said. "You get to meet all kinds of people. I love the atmosphere of the game."

Instead, Roberts said, the bias against women is financial.

"Women have a hard time just tapping the old boys' network, going into a bank board meeting and saying to the other members, 'I'd like some help here.' The women aren't on the board," Roberts said.

This year's election is difficult to analyze, she said, because of the early pick of Texas Gov. George W. Bush for the Republican nomination

"The Republicans settled on Bush, and they're very eager to win," Roberts said. "He had two big networks going for him his father's and his network as governor."

Before starting at ABC News in 1988, Roberts was a congressional correspondent for 10 years at National Public Radio, where she still works as an analyst.

She writes a syndicated weekly column with her husband, journalist Steve Roberts, and she is the author of the best-selling book, "We Are Our Mother's Daughters." Roberts' book focuses on the role of women in this century and the next, and she often is asked to comment on women's issues for ABC programs.

Roberts said she hasn't been discriminated against by the politicians she covers, but it was hard to get her first few jobs in journalism.

"In the bad old days, bosses had absolutely no hesitation about saying, 'We don't hire women to do that. Their voices aren't authoritative enough,'" she said. "Fortunately, that all became illegal."

Washburn University and Saint Mary College.

Erin Powell, sophomore in biochemistry and lieutenant governor for the North Division, said the importance lies in the feeling that comes from volunteering.

"When I help others, it makes me feel very good," Powell said. "This organization allows you to accomplish something that not only helps yourself, but helps others too."

Bowser said each year, each chapter of Circle K is required to set a goal of how many hours of community service it will complete. This year K-State has set a goal of 650 hours, of which Bowser said more than half are completed.

"We, as members of Circle K, donate our time to benefit the community," Bowser said. "In this way, we are hoping to make a difference in someone's life."

Bowser said activities the organization plans and participates in during the year include working with children or the elderly. She said 16 projects have been completed, and they are spread throughout the semester so all the members can participate in several.

"The students involved wouldn't be here unless they wanted to," Bowser said. "Those in the organization do not do it to gain hours they might need in some of their majors, but do it for the main enjoyment of helping someone else."

JEFF COOPER/COLLEGIAN

Mayor Roger Reitz laughs with others at his table during the fifth-annual Mayor's Holiday Tree Hunger Dinner. The purpose of the dinner was to educate people on how many hungry people there are in Manhattan.

Dinner educates community about hunger

BY LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jazz music filled the Union Food Court dining area, and well-dressed people mingled and drank lemon water from wine glasses — but this was no ordinary luncheon.

The fifth annual Mayor's Holiday Tree Hunger Dinner was to educate people about how many hungry people there are in Manhattan.

Each year at the event, three different types of meals are served. Everyone gives a $15 donation, but some people get the meal of a rich person, some eat the meal of a middle-class person and others receive the meal of a poor person.

Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, an organization that helps feed hungry people, said the event teaches people to appreciate what they have.

"It is very humbling," Cathy Hutchinson, a diner, said.

Mayor Roger Reitz said during the opening welcome that when he was in college, he went four days without eating in order to earn $25. He said he couldn't believe how hard it was and how irritable it made him.

After the mayor spoke, the meals were served. Eight people sat at each table, and no one knew which meal they would receive. Only one person got the rich meal, which was steak, potatoes, crab cakes, a salad, grilled vegetables and a raspberry cobbler for desert. Two people got the average meal, which was chicken, potatoes and corn. The five others received a plain meal of beef goulash.

The numbers represent the actual number of people in the United States who can't afford adequate food, proportionate to those who eat well every day.

After the meals were served, Wayne Franklin, director of public affairs for Southwestern Bell and a pastor in Topeka, spoke to the crowd about hunger.

"We can all feel better by helping other people. One good meal can help all of us perform at a higher level," Franklin said to the diners.

Franklin said one way people can help is by donating leftover food.

"Ninety-six billion pounds of food are wasted by Americans. Large institutions are giving back their leftovers. Manhattan is blessed to have an organization like that," Franklin said.

Many people said the event went well.

"It's a very unique event. Other cities would do well to observe it," said Paul Vannostran, co-chairman of the Mayor's Holiday Tree.

"I have mixed emotions. It's exciting to see people get involved like this, but it's sad, too, to see how many people out there are still hungry. We all think of hunger being so far away," Jerry Hutchinson, a diner, said.

The Hutchinsons both received the goulash meal.

"It's more than some people get," Cathy Hutchinson said.

Bramhall said there are many more events that will be taking place to raise food. Cats for Cans will be at the Nov. 20 football game against the University of Missouri.

Food collections also will take place at Dillons food stores on Saturdays and at all other sporting events, such as volleyball games.

"We really want a lot of students to become involved," Bramhall said.

Bramhall said students who can't go home for Thanksgiving are invited to the community Thanksgiving dinner at Manhattan High School East Campus from noon to 2 p.m. Thanksgiving Day.

The total amount of food raised for the drive will be announced at the Mayor's Holiday Tree Lighting Ceremony on Nov. 29 in Triangle Park.

Palestinians suspected in bombing

BY RON KAMPEAS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NETANYA, Israel — On the eve of final status talks with the Palestinians, police on Sunday blamed an explosion in the busy coastal town of Netanya on Islamic militants opposed to the process.

Three pipe bombs injured 33 Israelis and raised questions about whether Palestinians are able to meet the Israeli expectation of peace — an end to terror.

There were no fatalities. Two of the victims suffered moderate injuries and the rest were injured slightly, said Danny Hadad, deputy police commander of Netanya and the surrounding area. Ambulances took 21 victims to hospitals, while others arrived on foot or by car.

A fourth pipe bomb failed to explode. It was taken to the beach by the police bomb squad and detonated safely.

Three Palestinian suspects were detained, but two were released after questioning, police spokesperson Sivan Kedmi said. Army radio said dozens of Palestinians were rounded up because they lacked the necessary permits to be in Netanya.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak said the government will not capitulate to terrorism. "There are elements who will try to torpedo the peace process," he told reporters. "They will not succeed. The government and the security services will smash the terrorism."

"There are elements who will try to torpedo the peace process They will not succeed."

— Ehud Barak, Israeli prime minister

The pipe bombs, placed close together, exploded outside a large bank in a busy shopping area. The twisted remains of a bicycle and a garbage can blown open by the bomb lay on a charred sidewalk at an intersection.

The area, busy with bomb disposal experts in flak jackets and helmets, was closed off. Forensic experts in white overalls and gloves combed the area for evidence.

At a street corner near the site, about 30 residents of Netanya gathered and shouted, "Death to Arabs."

Israeli and Palestinian representatives are scheduled to meet Monday in the West Bank town of Ramallah to begin negotiations on a permanent peace agreement.

Last week, Israel, the Palestinians and the United States launched so-called final status peace talks, which address permanent borders of the Palestinian entity, the future of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and conflicting claims on Jerusalem and division of water resources.

Militant Islamic groups are opposed to the peace talks and have sworn to sabotage them.

The explosions come the day after the militant Islamic Hamas movement faxed a leaflet to an international news agency threatening attacks against Israeli citizens.

Hamas said Israel would be to blame for the attacks because it had ignored a cease-fire offer from the group that would involve the evacuation of settlers from disputed lands.

"We will not hesitate to announce that the next weeks and months will witness an escalation in the size and nature of our armed attacks," the leaflet said, signed by the group's military wing.

Still, no group claimed responsibility. Sheik Ahmed Yassin, the spiritual leader of Hamas, said he could not yet say whether his group was involved in the explosion, stressing that he did not directly oversee Hamas' military wing.

"I want to stress that Hamas strategy is opposed to attacks against innocent civilians, yet we are continuing with our resistance against the occupation as long as the occupiers remain on our land," Yassin said in an interview with The Associated Press at his home in the Gaza Strip, his eyes wandering to Israeli TV coverage of the attack.

K-State baseball player Reid arrested for sexual battery

K-State baseball pitcher Brett Reid was arrested Wednesday for aggravated sexual battery.

Riley County Police Department said the arrest was the result of a two-day investigation into the incident, which occurred Nov. 1.

The RCPD said the victim said Reid used unnecessary force and touched the subject in an inappropriate fashion.

Reid, 20, has been suspended from team activities until the issue is resolved, Kent Brown, K-State sports information director, said.

"He is not involved in any team activities and will not be until the issue is resolved. It's a situation that has to be worked out. The team is secondary at this point," Brown said.

The K-State baseball season does not begin until February.

Reid was released on $1,000 bond.

Orion String Quartet plans Saturday-night performance

The Orion String Quartet will perform at 8 p.m. Saturday in All Faiths Chapel as part of the McCain Performance Series.

In 1995, Wynton Marsalis, the first Pulitzer Prize-winning jazz composer, wrote his first classical piece specifically for the quartet.

Sony Classical released the quartet's recording of the composition, String Quartet No. 1 "At the Octoroon Balls," in June 1999.

The piece will be included as part of the quartet's K-State performance.

Cora Cooper, associate professor of music, will discuss the quartet's music selections prior to the performance as part of McCain's Pre-Performance Lecture Series.

The discussion will take place at 7 p.m. in McCain 204.

Tickets to the Orion String Quartet's concert are available through the McCain box office, which can be reached at 532-6428.

Tickets are $18 for the general public, $16 for people 65 years and older and $9 for K-State students and children 18 years and younger.

Students work at NASA to lift off new project

By COURTNEY DUFFIELD
Kansas State Collegian

A team of K-State-Salina engineering professors and students traveled to the Kennedy Space Center in Cape Canaveral Florida on Sunday to present a proposal for a programmable controller on the Mars Simulation Chamber.

Randy Buchanan, associate professor of electrical engineering, is in charge of the project. Students selected to work on the project were Aubri Barnett, junior in electronic engineering technology; Steve Blick, senior in electronic engineering technology; Jeff Mulder, junior in electronic engineering technology; Casper Buel, senior in mechanical engineering technology; and Lee McNabb, junior in electronic engineering technology. Raju Danu, assistant professor of mechanical engineering technology is also working on the project.

"A friend of mine started working for Mr. Buchanan, and they needed more students to work for Mr. Buchanan," McNabb said.

The team started work on its proposal this summer. Buchanan and some of the students on the team traveled to Marshal Flight Center in Alabama for the first half of the summer and Kennedy Space Center for the second half of the summer.

Mulder said the main purpose of the team's work during the summer was to create a recommendation for what kind of work NASA possibly could do on the chamber. The team also finished the necessary paperwork for its proposal, Mulder said.

"It is a continuation of a project I started this summer when I was down there," Buchanan said.

The team has been working on several designs that could be used for the programmable controller, which is an industrial computer used to collect and measure data in an environment similar to the environment found on Mars. It is located in the control system of the chamber.

Aging secretary resigns in swirl of controversy

The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Before Terry Glasscock left the Department on Aging, he and then-secretary Thelma Hunter Gordon worked out a deal, by which he would be a paid consultant to the department, according to The Wichita Eagle.

Gordon resigned Nov. 1 after it was discovered that she had awarded a $135,000 no-bid contract to Glasscock, a friend of Gov. Bill Graves and brother of House Majority Leader Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan.

Graves and Kent Glasscock have said they had no knowledge of the arrangement.

On May 24, Gordon announced in a memo to department staff and area aging agencies that Glasscock, who intended to move to Boston, would continue work on re-engineering the department after he left as deputy secretary.

"Anyone who knows me knows that I encourage employees to expand their horizons and tackle new goals," Gordon wrote. "That is the case in the situation of Terry Glasscock."

The Eagle obtained the memo and other records under the Kansas Open Records Act and reported its finding in its Sunday editions.

Glasscock's last day on the job was May 28. Four days later, he was continuing his work with the agency as a paid consultant.

POLITICAL PULL

"THIS IS GEORGE BUSH'S INTRODUCTION TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE."
Cokie Roberts, ABC News Analyst

TV analyst discusses elections at Monday's Landon Lecture

STORY BY TRAVIS D. LENKNER

The 2000 presidential election is Texas Governor George W. Bush's to lose, ABC News analyst Cokie Roberts said Monday.

Evan Semon/Collegian
ABC News political analyst Cokie Roberts takes time after her speech to sign a poster for Meghan Misenhelter, a freshman in art.

"It looks like it's George W. Bush unless George W. Bush does something to stop it from" being George W. Bush," Roberts said.

Roberts was on campus to deliver the 116th Landon Lecture in McCain Auditorium.

In a speech laced with humor and joking references to the Monica Lewinsky scandal, Roberts told the crowd of 900 her thoughts about next year's presidential election.

Bush likely will win the Republican nomination, Roberts said, but other candidates are waiting for him to endure more public scrutiny and possibly suffer in the polls.

"This is George Bush's introduction to the American people," Roberts said. "The rest of the Republican field is really just waiting, but some couldn't hold on long enough."

Roberts is the chief congressional analyst for ABC News and co-hosts "This Week with Sam Donaldson and Cokie Roberts" on Sunday mornings. She also is a news analyst for National Public Radio, where she worked for 10 years as a congressional correspondent.

Her speech was scheduled to start at 11:30 a.m. but began at 2 p.m. after Roberts' original flight from Washington, D.C., was canceled. K-State pilots flew Roberts from St. Louis, Mo. to Manhattan.

Roberts spoke at length about the role of women in politics, including the possibility of a female vice president in the 2000 election.

Elizabeth Dole, who dropped out of the race last month, would be a viable choice for Bush, Roberts said, and a female on the ticket could help Republicans woo female voters.

"If he were willing to take a chance, I think that would make a lot of sense — and I think Mrs. Dole is interested," Roberts said. "(A female candidate) can't win the women vote, but she can cut into it enough so that coupled with a man's vote, you can win."

A female vice president also would set the stage for a woman as commander in chief, Roberts said.

"The way we'll get a woman president is to elect a woman vice president and then the guy will do himself in one way or another," she joked.

Roberts' best-selling 1998 book, "We Are Our Mother's Daughters," focused on the role of women throughout the 20th century.

Roberts spoke for about 40 minutes before turning to the audience for questions. She also signed several autographs after the lecture, including one for Meghan Misenhelter, freshman in art.

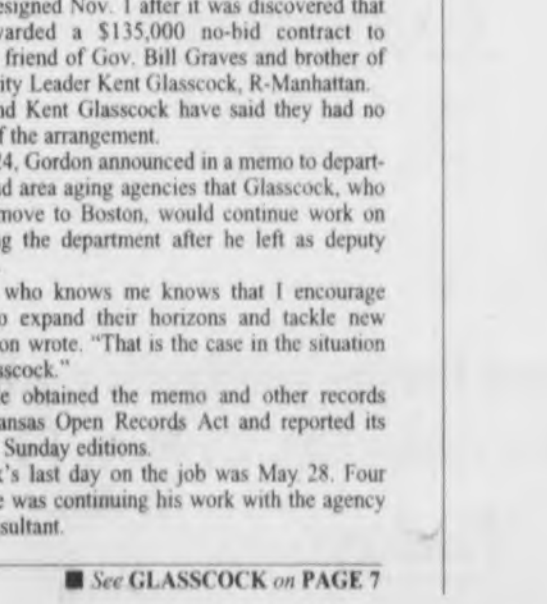
"I loved it," Misenhelter said of the speech. "I thought she was really funny, and that added a lot to her speech.

"I grew up with Cokie, but I wasn't prepared for the humorous side of Cokie," she said.

Roberts' speech wasn't all quips, though; she also analyzed Congress' role in the 2000 election.

Whichever party wins the White House likely will not have control of the House and Senate, Roberts said, because voters don't want to give ideological control to one party.

"Voters have caught on," Roberts said. "When Congress and the White House are both Democratic, all of the legislation is too much to the left. When they are both Republican, things are too much to the right.



"The Democrats' best hope to get Congress is George W. Bush as president, and the Republican's best hope is Al Gore as president," she said.

Roberts' Landon Lecture was the first this year. The series is named for Alf

Classy Cats, cheerleading squad seek to create diversity

By MICHAEL NOLL

Black alumni reunion highlights lack of involvement by minorities, starts drive to increase participation

The lack of diversity among K-State cheerleaders and Classy Cats has prompted efforts to encourage minorities to try out for the squads.

Most recently, the problem gained attention following a black alumni reunion.

"Most alumni attended the football game," said Jewel Jones Harris, Multicultural Programs and Services director. "They were upset and very concerned that the football team had a strong representation of students of color, but the cheerleading squads did not."

Harris and Mordean Taylor-Archer, Diversity and Dual Career Development associate provost, then met with the administration of the Departement of Intercollegiate Athletics to discuss the alumni concerns and ways to increase minority participation. They decided to write letters to all minority students to explain the problem and inform them of the opportunities that exist to increase students' familiarity with cheerleading and Classy Cats practices.

In a possibly hopeful sign, about 50 students wrote back expressing interest in the squads, Taylor-Archer said.

There are several opportunities for all students to learn more about the squads, Cindy Fox, assistant athletic director, said.

"All practices are open," Fox said. "Anybody can come in and watch. There is also a series of workshops in the spring where the cheerleaders show the things they do."

In the past, about 25 percent of those who tried out for the cheerleading squads were minorities, but some of them did not complete the three-day tryout, sophomore cheerleader Jenny Tryon said.

"Some don't make it all the way through," Tryon said. "We have clinics for two days and the tryout on the third, and some just drop out by their choice."

Taylor-Archer said she believes many minority students sometimes are at a disadvantage in the tryouts due to inexperience. She hopes that attending practices and workshops will help level the playing field.

"Some people come from different schools and backgrounds, and they might not know the steps," Taylor-Archer said. "I would like to see students more competitive when they try out."

Tryon said she is not sure there will be a marked difference in the number of minorities who try out for the next cheerleading squads.

"We're not really doing anything different than in the past," Tryon said of the open practices and workshops. "If anything, more publicity is going to help increase the number."

Despite the unsuccessful recruiting in the past, increasing minority participation still is a university priority, athletic director Max Urick said.

"It's been a goal of mine to make a special effort to attract minorities," Urick said. "I'd certainly like to have a more representative cheer squad."

The current percentage of students who are considered minorities is about 12 percent. The largest group is African-American students, who comprise almost 3 percent of the student population. Therefore, to make the cheerleading and Classy Cats squads at the very least representative of the student population, three of the 20 Classy Cats would have to be minority students, one of whom would be African-American. The numbers would be the same for the 23 cheerleaders.

Chanute man faces charges in store clerk's slaying case

CHANUTE, Kan. — A man charged with killing an assistant manager of a Chanute grocery story during a robbery last week was arrested during the weekend.

Christopher A. Davisson, 27, of Chanute, was taken into custody Saturday morning at a motel in Wichita, Chanute Police Chief Sam Budreau said. He was brought to the Neosho County jail, and was scheduled to appear in court Monday afternoon.

A female also was taken into custody for questioning, the chief said.

Davisson is charged with felony murder during an act of aggravated robbery in the death of Judd L. Gossett, 24, of Iola.

Gossett was killed last Wednesday night at the Sav-A-Lot store in Chanute. A co-worker found the body. An undisclosed amount of money was taken. Gossett and his wife moved to Iola, Kan., from Crawford County last July, when he began working at the grocery store.

Army to inspect helicopters after crash earlier this year

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Army said Monday it will inspect all 743 of its Apache attack helicopters and temporarily ground those found to have a type of tail rotor bearing that is believed to have caused an Apache crash early this year.

The bearings will be replaced and the Apaches will be returned to duty, spokesman Jim Stueve said. An unknown number of Apaches have a newer kind of tail rotor bearing that will not need to be replaced.

No Apaches will fly until the inspections are completed this week, Stueve said.

The Apache, made by Boeing, is the Army's best attack helicopter and is deployed both in the United States and abroad.

The decision to inspect the full fleet was made when the Army recently determined that the bearing was the cause of an Apache crash last January at Fort Rucker, Ala., in which the helicopter was destroyed and the two-man crew suffered minor injuries, Stueve said.

Parents face death penalty after 5 children die in fire

CHARLESTON, W.Va. — The Browns got out alive when their house burned down. Five children didn't make it. Ricky Lee Brown told others that he was too busy fighting the fire to save any of the youngsters. His wife, Barbara, said she just "didn't think about it."

Prosecutors, however, suspect they thought about it plenty.

The Browns and a housemate are accused of setting the 1997 fire and killing the children for more than $61,000 in insurance proceeds.

A federal jury is hearing the case against Brown, 25, who could get the death penalty if convicted. His wife and a third adult who was staying at their house in Weston, Janette Ables, will be tried separately.

"They did this because they were tired of their children. Their children interfered with their lifestyles," federal prosecutor Robert McWilliams said.

Prosecutors contend the Browns and Ables poured gasoline and set the fire. Five adults in all escaped unharmed. The insurance proceeds on Brown's home and three stepchildren added up to $61,449 — enough to buy a house in the country. He signed a contract on one just three weeks after the children were buried.

This is the first federal death penalty case to be tried in West Virginia. The death penalty under West Virginia state law was abolished in 1965. The defendants are charged with conspiracy, fraud and arson resulting in death, which is punishable by the death penalty.

Ables' children, ages 3 and 5, died along with Barbara Brown's children from a previous marriage, ages 8, 9 and 10. Playmates in life, the five were buried next to each other in two caskets paid for by the state.

Former dictator plans move as extradition trial drags on LONDON — Gen. Augusto Pinochet is to move from his rented country mansion at the end of the month, and associates of the former Chilean dictator have asked police if a seaside location would be suitable, the Daily Telegraph reported Monday.

Pinochet, 83, has been under house arrest since October 1998 on a Spanish warrant seeking his extradition to face trial for alleged human rights abuses during his 17-year rule.

The lease of the house he is renting in the upscale Wentworth Estate, 20 miles west of London, ends this month, the Telegraph said.

Associates of the general declined to say whether the landlord had refused to renew his lease or if Pinochet had decided to move, the newspaper said.

Calls to Pinochet's London lawyers seeking comment were not returned Monday.

Neighbors have complained they were disturbed by the house being floodlit and by police with submachine guns on the grounds, the Telegraph said.

A new home for Pinochet must be approved by a magistrate who set his bail conditions and by police.

Pinochet was arrested at a London hospital Oct. 16 last year while he was recovering from back surgery.

Computer software helps track grades, schedules

■ Union Bookstore declines to carry organizer for now.

BY MONICA HAYDEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Staying organized is an important key to college success, and Success Tracker Software Company Inc., is working to make it easier.

The California-based company has developed the Collegiate Organizer, a software program for Microsoft Windows.

Fifty percent of the program is directed toward students' courses, which involves their homework, exams and schedule of classes, said Sam Sood, president of Success Tracker Software Company Inc.

"With homework and exams, they enter the data, and what it does is update their course grade on a day-to-day basis," he said.

Chris Loehr, computer buyer for the K-State Student Union Bookstore, has seen a demo of the Collegiate Organizer. He said it also allows students to keep track of their grade point average.

"It lets you go in and set up how the university does their GPA, whether it is on a four point, three point or five point system," Loehr said.

Loehr said the bookstore has decided not to carry the Collegiate Organizer because it has carried similar products in the past, which have not sold.

"There have been a lot of different versions of it," he said. "It seems to resurface every year in a different format. Some seem to sell better than others."

He said he would order the Collegiate Organizer if enough students requested the product.

"It would be nice if the demand was there to order something like this," he said.

Budgeting is another main feature of the program that has been tailored to students, Sood said.

"The money management section is simple-money management for four months. Students can then go through the semester and have a better understanding of their cash flow," Sood said. "This is geared toward the student not from a complicated business management point of view. We have downsized it for the student."

The Collegiate Organizer also offers a contact manager, Loehr said.

"You can keep track of your friends, neighbors, any business contacts and interviews. The contact manager also lets you e-mail the people once you have put the information in," he said.

Sood said the Collegiate Organizer is user friendly.

"To get started and acquainted with the program, it will take students about a half an hour," he said. "The flow is very easy."

Loehr said he thinks the program is powerful and well designed.

"You can store a lot of information. You can access a lot of information, he said. "It is clean and does not try to overwhelm you on one page. It is pretty easy to navigate."

He said although the program has many good attributes, it also is time consuming to use.

"Although it is real powerful and lets you do a lot of things, maybe if someone is wanting something quick and simple to enter, it might be too much of a process," he said.

"There is no interface that lets you get in there quick and fast, add something and get back out."

Wichita State University Bookstore has offered the Collegiate Organizer since August, and although students have showed interest, no one has purchased it, Steve Amirr, electronics buyer for Wichita State University Bookstore, said.

He said the time that one must put into it might be why students have decided not to purchase the program.

"The only problem is actually sitting down at the computer and entering all the information," Amirr said.

The Collegiate Planner might be more suitable for students who have laptop computers as opposed to those who have desk computers, Loehr said.

"With a paper planner, you can just flip it open and write in it. A computer, you have to start it up to get to the program, and that then takes extra time," Loehr said.

"Plus, you can't carry it around with you. You have to carry a regular planner, write down your notes, come back to the computer, get into the program and put that stuff in, so it is duplicating the effort."

The Collegiate Organizer retails for $24.95, Sood said.

He said if students have a chance to try the product, they will find it beneficial and worth the price.

"Students who have seen this program have said the advice is good, and the product is good. It is a one of a kind product," Sood said.

Loehr said the program is a good value for the money.

"It would just be up to the individual student whether they felt they had the time to use it," he said.

Jo Erin Peterson, junior in business, said she would consider using the Collegiate Organizer.

"As college students, we have so many different things going on in so many different parts of our life, and something like this would be great," she said. "Also, if you think about it, you can pay that much for some planners."

2 more escapees from northeast Kansas jail captured; police continue search for final fugitive from jailbreak

HIAWATHA, Kan. — Two of the five prisoners who escaped from a northeast Kansas jail over the weekend were captured today, leaving one still at large.

Brown County Sheriff Lamar Shoemaker said Rodney Alamguer, 21, and Kevin Donnell, 20, both of Kansas City, Kan., were arrested mid-morning after he and a deputy found them in a vacant home in Hiawatha.

Still being sought was Arthur Wilhelm, 37, also of Kansas City, Kan.

Shoemaker said officers got a call about a burglary at a residence, where food and clothing had been taken. He said while checking the area they noticed another nearby house that might be vacant.

The sheriff said they saw a window had been broken, leading them to believe there might have been another burglary.

Officers surrounded the house, and as they were waiting, the two fugitives appeared and were arrested.

"I don't know if they knew we were there or not, but when they opened the door they did," Shoemaker said.

The five prisoners were in a recreation yard Saturday afternoon when they apparently rammed their bodies through a 7-foot-tall chain-link gate as a deputy who normally watches the yard was busy elsewhere, officials said.

The men then broke into a church next to the jail in downtown Hiawatha, where they took off their orange jumpsuits and put on used clothing taken from the church's thrift shop, Undersheriff Randy Linck said.

The inmates then allegedly stole three nearby vehicles and fanned out.

Joseph Mabery, 19, also of Kansas City, Kan., was captured after a traffic accident in neighboring Doniphan County.

Authorities said a van reported stolen in Hiawatha collided with another vehicle at a stop sign near Wathena as it was being chased by a Doniphan County deputy.

The five prisoners were in a recreation yard Saturday afternoon when they apparently rammed their bodies through a 7-foot-tall chain-link gate as a deputy who normally watches the yard was busy elsewhere, officials said.

Mabery had been in custody for failure to appear in court.

Martin Yoho, 23, of Hutchinson, Kan., was caught driving one of the cars early Sunday in Pawnee, Okla., the sheriff's department said.

Almaguer was being kept in Brown County while awaiting trial on a felony charge of battery against a law enforcement officer stemming from an incident in the Wyandotte County Jail, said Jerry Gorman, Wyandotte County assistant district attorney.

Almaguer and another man in October 1998 with killing a teen-ager and a 20-year-old man in the Rosedale area of Kansas City, Kan. Almaguer pleaded guilty to lesser charges in exchange for testimony against his co-defendant and was sentenced to about four years in prison, Gorman said.

Almaguer, Donnell, Wilhelm and Mabery were Wyandotte County Jail inmates being kept in Hiawatha on a contract basis.

The escapee still at large, Wilhelm, is white, stands 6 feet tall, weighs 260 pounds and has brown hair and brown eyes, with tattoos on both hands.

He was being kept for an alleged robbery.

Saturday's jail break was the second for Yoho in a little more than a week. He escaped earlier from the Reno County Jail in Hutchinson after being asked by authorities to participate in an undercover operation.

Microsoft ruling best for industry, buyers

With a judge's recent ruling against Microsoft Corporation in the U.S. Dept. of Justice case against the company, the computing age just got a little more complex. But the computing public should stand and cheer. Microsoft argued it provided a service to consumers by making its browser, Microsoft Explorer, available to the public with its Windows products. Its policies hurt the options of consumers, and its practice ultimately hampered creativity.

Monopolies are the ultimate failure of capitalism. If one company dominates a market, innovation slows and can come to a complete stop. With Microsoft's Windows well on its way to becoming the only operating system preinstalled on most computers sold these days, Microsoft had little incentive to improve its product. And anyone who has used Windows will attest that it could stand some improvement.

But won't additional competition complicate things? Definitely. Consider cars. When Ford Motor Company first started mass production, you could have one kind. And it was good if you wanted the model in black. That was the only choice. Now, choices aren't confined to color. But don't take your Toyota to a Ford dealer to get it fixed. It won't have the right parts.

Without one particular system that "everybody" uses, software designers might have to learn a variety of systems before they can write programs. And if they choose to make their program compatible with the wrong system, their program might not be as successful or as accessible to consumers as they might wish.

In the end, however, everyone will benefit from the justice department's ruling against Microsoft. The decision was a clear point in favor of creativity in the U.S. computing market.

OUT the WINDOW

Microsoft decision shows company's fear of up-and-coming Internet industry

I love watching cartoons.

I'm particularly famous for sitting in my underwear and zoning out everything but the television for hours on end. Sometimes, when I'm diligently watching cartoons, I will drool. Other times, when I'm really watching cartoons diligently, I will forget to breathe.

I particularly like watching shows about superheroes. I like the battle between good and evil. There's something special about distinctions between the two that usually is present only in cartoons.

Notice I said usually. Sometimes reality mimics cartoons, and at those times I have an excuse to turn on CNN, sit in my underwear, drool and forget to breathe. The Microsoft Corp. trial has been like that. U.S. District Judge Thomas "The Enforcer" Penfield Jackson ruled Friday that Microsoft is, in fact, a monopoly, and had, in fact, used its market dominance to work-over the competition.

Microsoft is not the good guy in this case.

I should make a distinction. It is important to note that a monopoly is not just a large company. Many large companies become large and stay large because they make a better product. Microsoft became large, and then maintained that status by asserting influence. In a competitive market, innovative companies that deliver an improved or cheaper product go head-to-head with the big dogs, because the advantage incurred by the consumer choosing a different product is enough for them to switch loyalties.

In the Microsoft market, there is no room for another product to squeeze in. Windows comes already loaded on every PC. That means that if someone wants to choose a new operating system, they pay for it on top of the price of the computer. The fact that Windows is incorporated into the cost of a new PC also means that Microsoft can set the price for Windows well above anything reasonably competitive without consumers raising an eyebrow. Think about it: what's another $30, $40 or $50 for the application compared to the price of a computer?

There's evidence of this, namely that IBM's OS/2 Warp died as soon as it took its first breath and Apple's Mac-OS continues to fail to attract many converts. Part of the problem is loyalty, even though much of OS/2 incorporated Windows-like interfaces. Consumers tend to believe that the reduction in efficiency they experience as a result of changing software is a result of poor software design. I can use Excel easily and efficiently. If I had to use Lotus 1-2-3, the result would be clumsy and inefficient. Lotus 1-2-3 might be designed better than Excel and even easier to use, but I would be unable to recognize these attributes without extending the effort to learn.

Microsoft's dominance is further magnified by the wealth of applications created to run on Windows-based software. At one point, Microsoft required applications to make its operating system successful, but now Windows is so dominant that software companies clamor to write for it. Any new operating system trying to enter the market could not be as competitive as Windows, because it would lack the wealth of different programs Windows offers. Computer manufacturers know this, too. A computer is only as good as the programs written to run on it. When certain applications were in a position to challenge Microsoft's dominance — such as Netscape's Navigator — Microsoft threatened to increase the price of Windows to those manufacturers that included Navigator in their setup. Since manufacturers had no alternative to Windows, they had to oblige.

Some pundits herald the decision as a new era in government control over business, but it is a popular misconception that government should like big business. Big business has the ability to challenge the government's power and influence. So, the government only tolerates big business as long as it is good for the economy. If a company grows so large as to threaten the natural flow of commerce and competition, that company is going down. Period.

I particularly like cartoons where an evil boss-person tries to formulate a plan to kill the pesky do-gooders. It's funny because every time the do-gooders win, which they invariably do, the boss-person invariably blames the spineless, blubbering, witless staff working for him. He screams, he yells, he gets red in the face, he stomps his feet and says things like, "I'll get you Gadget!" or "I would have succeeded, too, if it wasn't for those pesky kids!"

The boss-person, of course, always is a party to his own demise. He goes down because his plan is dumb and evil.

BOSS: "The plan is foolproof, even you blubbering idiots can handle this."

STAFF: "What will we do, boss?"

BOSS: "You will ruin all companies that offer popular multi-platform applications by telling computer manufacturers we will raise the price of our operating system to them if they choose the other guy's application. You then will lie to try to get people to believe that our alternative application is essential to our operating system and that they must have both if they want their computer to work. Simple."

STAFF: "Huh? What if people find out that you can separate the operating system from the application?"

BOSS: "The plan is ruined. Do not fail me. Ha, Ha, Ha, Hahhh."

In the end, the boss-persons get a taste of their own medicine.

No decision has yet been made on what sort of sanctions will be imposed on Microsoft, but the judge's ruling was made with such conviction that there is little doubt the government will order Microsoft to split like Bell in the '90s, withdraw certain products from the market, or change the way it handles licensing or any of another host of penalties the justice department can lay on rogue companies.

It was bound to happen.

The bad guy never wins in cartoons, despite his best efforts.

Even Jackson seemed bent on taking out the software giant. When news was released that Netscape merged with America Online, analysts pointed to it as a tic in Microsoft's win column. The Microsoft lawyers pointed to it as evidence of thriving competition in the computing industry. Jackson, however, went to great lengths to introduce evidence from an interview with AOL's Steve Case that strengthened the government's contentions that Microsoft wielded monopoly powers.

Microsoft is afraid of Netscape because it created a program that can be run on Windows machines and non-Windows machines easily. Web browsers are becoming increasingly powerful tools as the computer industry shifts its focus to the World Wide Web. Because Netscape can be installed on more machines than those with Windows-based operating systems, it has the potential to win a bigger market than Microsoft's Internet Explorer. It can use that market to challenge Windows' dominance.

Microsoft originally hit it big because it distributed MS-DOS in IBMs, then the most trusted name in the business. Microsoft grew because it didn't really matter who the manufacturer was. All MS-DOS programs ran the same, whether on a Dell computer or an IBM.

Netscape and AOL have been doing well because it doesn't matter what machine or operating system you run them on. They behave basically the same on a Mac and on a PC. As the Internet becomes increasingly important, operating systems will become less and less relevant. Microsoft knows this.

Windows is being thrown out the window.

Attention-starved females strive longingly for mindless banter with men

As a child, I thought there was nothing more annoying than having sand stuck to my body. I would jam bamboo shoots beneath my fingernails before getting into a sandbox after getting out of a pool. Now, I know there are far, far worse things.

At the top of that list is women who communicate only with men. Women, you know the type. These are women who walk into a room and completely ignore every female in it, but strike up a loud and obnoxious conversation with as many men as possible. Now, I don't claim to be a psychology major, but maybe they lacked a father figure. Maybe they think women are inferior and therefore need male approval to feel good about themselves. Whatever the case, they are starved for male attention, and all women suffer because of it.

Number one, they make men feel too important, because these women make them the sole object of their attentions. These women literally will ignore a question posed to them by a woman in favor of mindless banter with a man. This makes men feel powerful and wanted. That wouldn't be a problem, except men, in turn, expect this behavior from other women with more thought-provoking things to say.

Here's how it works: while obnoxious women carry on pointless conversations with men, wiser women talk amongst themselves thereby eliminating meaningful conversation between the sexes. That might be an exaggeration, but in the simplest terms, these women cause many of the problems between the sexes and a vast majority of the problems women have in communicating with one another.

Number two, it is frustrating to begin a conversation with a male-attention-starved female only to have her cut it short when a man enters the room. What makes it worse is these women only hold A-B conversations, which means if you happen to be of the feminine gender, you can C your way out of it. Even when the male participant in said alphabet conversation attempts to deal another woman in, she will be shut out by the male-attention-starved female. It's nine kinds of wrong.

The behavior of these women makes me not much want their company in one-on-one settings or in group situations. It makes me afraid to converse with other women for fear they will act like one of those loathsome attention-starveds. It's all a vicious cycle that keeps women from talking to one another.

Number three, every setting becomes forced competition even if you have no desire to compete, because those starved-for-male-attention females only talk to males, and other women talk to men for fear of running into a woman of the male-communicator type.

I say these things at the risk of being called angry and bitter because I believe all women should be able to talk to both men and one another.

Decision to recall McCulloh good display of democracy

Editor,

I am writing in response to the Nov. 4 article about City Commissioner Karen McCulloh. I want to start off by thanking the Collegian and the Citizens for Sensible Government for encouraging me to register to vote in the upcoming election. But I must place most of my thanks upon Citizens for Sensible government's treasurer, Glenn Busset. Busset is missing something in this electoral process. He said, "We are just a bunch of people that feel our city government is going in the wrong direction when someone can come in with a complaint and get a person like Karen McCulloh thrown out on a whim."

This was anything but a whim. The citizens who petitioned for a recall feel they have been betrayed by their city commission. They feel betrayed because McCulloh, Bruce Snead and Carol Peak decided to hide from the ACLU rather than fight with free legal help from two coalitions. They voted to remove the monolith, and forgot about what the people who elected them wanted.

Busset and the Citizens for Sensible Government need to review their American history. The First Amendment of the Constitution not only ensures freedom of speech and keeps Congress from establishing an official religion of the United States. It also insures the right " ... to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

In other words, it allows a call for the removal of a government official, if the people feel betrayed by that elected person. Now, Busset might argue this law is for national leaders and not the state, so we refer to Amendment 10, which says, "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The Constitution of the State of Kansas says, in Article 9, Section 5,: "All county and township officers may be removed from office, in such manner and for such cause, as shall be prescribed by law." This law is in the Kansas Bill of Rights: "The people have the right to assemble, in a peaceable manner, to consult for their common good, to instruct their representatives, and to petition the government, or any department thereof, for the redress of grievances."

Busset, this is no whim. The petitions have been signed and filed and the election is set. This is what democracy is all about — the freedom to choose your elected officials, and in the event that they do not fulfill the need and wants of the people they represent, they can be removed. I encourage everyone to register to vote, because this is no longer just about the Ten Commandments, but it now is about the basis of America and its government "... of the People, by the People, and for the People."

Women's tennis team concludes season with weekend tournament

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women's tennis team wrapped up the fall season at the Intercollegiate Tennis Association Rolex Regional Championships in Salt Lake City, Nov. 4-7 in a rebuilding year.

Freshman Alena Jecminkova and sophomore Petra Sedlmajerova each advanced to the third round of the singles draw at Eccles Tennis Center on the campus of the University of Utah.

JECMINKOVA

Jecminkova won both her matches Nov. 4, defeating Katarina Balan of Nebraska, 6-1, 6-0, in the first round, followed by an upset of No.- 6 seed Viviana Mracnova of Oklahoma, 6-1, 6-3, in round two.

Sedlmajerova, the No.-16 seed, also won both her first- and second-round matches, topping Colorado State's Amanda Bartz, 6-0, 6-3, and Missouri's Kristina Olshanskya, 6-1, 6-2.

However, Friday's round three proved difficult for both women. Jecminkova, after her two Thursday victories improved her fall singles record to 8-0, suffered her first loss of the year to Maria Galoustova of Oklahoma State, 6-3, 7-6, in the quarterfinals.

Sedlmajerova was defeated by No.-7 seed Natalie Alekhova of New Mexico, 3-6, 7-5, 7-5.

In other singles action, junior Anna Pampoulova, the No. 5 seed, finished 1-1 at regionals. She was eliminated in the second round Thursday by Brigham Young's Elizo veta Khoudoiarova, 6-4, 3-6, 6-2, following her first-round victory.

Junior Eva Novotna' finished 0-2 for the tournament. After losing in first round action, Novotna' was the No. 2 seed in the consolation bracket, but was upset Friday by Montana State's Mariska Steenkamp, 6-4, 6-4.

In doubles action, the team of Jecminkova and Pampoulova made it to the round of 16 before falling to No. 8 seed Monica Poveda and Jana Sidovic of Tulsa, 8-4, on Saturday. The duo advanced to the third round after receiving a first-round bye and defeating Friday's second-round opponents, Kendra Leese and Edna Vazquez of Iowa State, 8-1.

The other Wildcat doubles squad of Novotna' and Sedlmajerova fell to Oklahoma State's Ashleigh Dolman and Galoustova, 8-1.

The Wildcats will begin their spring season Jan. 21 against San Diego in Tucson, Ariz.

NFL, BCS thoughts contribute to cure for writer's block

Well, since I can't come up with a single topic compelling enough to fill my allotted space today, I'm going to once again fall back on the time-honored sports columnist method of dealing with writer's block. Again this week, I present to you a few loosely connected thoughts on football.

Surprised that the Team of the '90s candidate, the St. Louis Rams, have dropped two straight? You shouldn't be. Their recent matchups against Tennessee and Detroit are the only difficult ones they've had all season. Fans and commentators were so awestruck at the usually hapless Rams' 6-0 start, no one seemed to catch the fact that they did it against a slate of teams with a combined 12-40 record so far this season.

Legitimate or not, though, the Rams still figure to finish out with the best record in the NFC, maybe the entire league. Thanks largely to playing in what is by far the league's worst division, the NFC West, (combined record aside from the Rams: 9-24) the back half of St. Louis's schedule is equally cream-filled as the front. Their opponents for the last eight contests this season sport a robust .333 winning percentage, balancing only 22 wins against 44 losses thus far.

The Rams should be the NFC's top seed come playoff time, but expect an early exit when Dick Vermeil's squad has to play a team who really earned its invite to the postseason.

Speaking of playoff teams, the Kansas City Chiefs put up a good fight on the road against an excellent Indianapolis squad Sunday, but came up just short. The agonizingly close loss, though, brought with it enough what-ifs to fill a dump truck.

What if Larry Parker hadn't fumbled without being touched on a fourth-quarter punt return, setting up the Colts' go-ahead score?

What if the Chiefs had wisely continued to emphasize a successful passing game in the fourth quarter, instead of trying to grind it out at a very inopportune time?

What if the Chiefs hadn't accrued 20 yards in penalties, killing a crucial drive with about five minutes remaining?

What if Elvis Grbac knew how to effectively run a two-minute drill?

The Chiefs have been thoroughly unable to make plays when they need them most this season and their tireless devotion to a mediocre running game and lack of confidence in Grbac to make plays in the clutch bit them again Sunday.

Offensive coordinator Jimmy Raye's play-calling was conservative and predictable when Kansas City needed to generate yards in a hurry, and it cost them. In fact, in their three losses, the Chiefs have not managed a single, solitary offensive point in the fourth quarter thanks largely to blown opportunities and miscues like those mentioned above.

The run for the postseason will be a photo finish in the AFC, and Kansas City will have to find a knack for coming up with big plays under big pressure if it wants to get there. Facing a grueling schedule down the stretch, wins won't drop into the Chiefs' laps, so they'd better learn how to reach up and take them if they want to play into January.

Speaking of photo finishes, isn't this BCS stuff great? Things are getting nutty again, and once again the Wildcats are up to their purple ears in it. The much-maligned BCS seems to be working well enough so far. Not as well as a playoff, but it'll do. Now if we could only do something about these AP voters...

Call me crazy, but undefeated or not, the No. 2 team in the nation is not, in my mind, one who narrowly escapes fearsome 3-6 West Virginia with a two-point, last-second win, which Virginia Tech did.

For that matter, nor is the fourth-best team in the land one who ekes out a seven-point win, at home, over 5-4 Vanderbilt (whose respectable record is pretty much a mirage, given its competition). Florida achieved that distinction this weekend, though, and it too sits above the Wildcats in the polls, who admittedly didn't turn the world on its ear against Colorado, but at least they were playing a competent team.

Given how quickly the voters are willing to drop a team to the nether regions of the Top 25 following a loss, it would seem to make a bit more sense if the voters showed some restraint in advancing teams who barely beat inferior competition. Oh, how I wish they gave me a vote.

Finally, speaking of jumping up in the polls, K-State visits Nebraska this weekend (as if you didn't know). The Cornhuskers hopped up from ninth to sixth following this weekend's shelling of Texas A&M, and sit one spot behind the Wildcats entering this weekend's contest.

Though I'm withholding my fearless prediction for the game until Friday's Collegian, I will say this — the game will be won by whoever can pass the ball more effectively. The two teams appear more or less evenly matched in every other facet of the game, so who pulls the best Dan Fouts impression could well be the deciding factor in who sits atop the Big 12 North at the end of this weekend.

K-State center Angie Finkes goes up for a shot against the Club Gija Marijampole from Lithuania on Monday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State women use accurate shooting, rebounding to open exhibition season with win

The K-State women's basketball team began its season with a 77-45 victory over Club Gija Marijampole in its first exhibition game Monday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Wildcats led from the 17-minute mark of the first half through the rest of the game, connecting on 29 of 63 shots for 46-percent shooting and grabbing 42 rebounds.

The post players dominated the scoring with seniors Angie Finkes, Nicky Ramage and Olga Firsova each scoring 12 points, the team high. Finkes and Ramage notched eight rebounds each, with Firsova following with seven.

Coach Deb Patterson said she was pleased with the team's first effort and the depth of her bench.

"It was an excellent feeling and I know we're all extremely excited about having depth and being able to give some players who haven't yet had minutes some time," Patterson said.

"I had really hoped tonight to be able to focus strictly on execution and to get into rhythm. I wasn't necessarily concerned with getting a lot of players in, but because we couldn't get any continuity and any flow it was conducive to playing a lot of players."

Eleven Wildcats contributed to the effort, including 15 minutes from backup point guard Morgen Finneran.

"I was extremely pleased with her play tonight," Patterson said. "She's more confident and a much more fluid player, and if Morgen can come in and spot April (Sailors) some minutes without turnovers and handle pressure that teams will throw at her, that will be very valuable."

Junior point guard Sailors led the team in assists with four and scored 10 points, including two three-pointers in her first game with K-State. She said she was satisfied with her game but did have some first-game jitters.

"I think I got a little anxious sometimes," Sailors said. "We need to get more of an offense and more people involved. I made some good shots but I also made some poor decisions. Sometimes I wouldn't be patient enough and I'd get a little too anxious and try to make things happen and then that would lead to either a turnover or not as good of a chance as we might have had."

Kristin Rethman led the team in three-point scoring, making three of five attempts for nine of her 10 total points. Jenny Coalson returned to the court after a medical redshirt last year, scoring five points and three assists.

The Cats held the Lithuanian club to just 30.6-percent shooting, making 15 of 49 from the field, while 12 of its points came from free throws. Patterson said this game showed her the team needs to work on defense.

"Defensively I thought we had some real serious breakdowns, just some open-look threes I wasn't very pleased with and some penetration breakdowns at times," Patterson said.

Finkes hyperextended her elbow at Saturday's practice but said it was a minor injury and started the game. She said the game should show the team areas in which they can improve.

"I think we did well tonight, but I think we can do much, much better," Finkes said. "It was kind of hard for the post to get into any kind of rhythm or game tonight because the shots we're used to taking are power, turn and shoot, and the way that they played, we just couldn't do that tonight. I see tons of room that we can get better."

Simoneau honored; Cats climb in polls

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Linebacker Mark Simoneau earned Southwestern Bell Big 12 Defensive Player for the Week following K-State's 20-14 victory over the Colorado Buffaloes on Saturday at KSU Stadium.

The senior from Smith Center, Kan., anchored the nation's No. 2 total defense in holding the Buffs to just 74 yards of total offense in the first three quarters of the game, and to a game total 214. Simoneau led the Cats with 12 tackles, while picking up two sacks as well.

Simoneau still is in contention for the Dick Butkus Award and Bronko Nagurski National Defensive Player of the Year Award. Football News also named Simoneau a top-15 finalist for the Defensive Player of the Year.

This season, Simoneau leads K-State in total tackles with 71 and sacks with 6.5. He also extended his conference leading tackles for losses to six for -77 yards.

What's the BIG DEAL?!

Money matters lecture to teach budgeting, smart spending

BY MEGAN RICHESON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Not having enough money is a problem that most college students face at one point or another as they struggle to pay for their education.

For this reason, the K-State Women's Center, K-State Campus Ministries and UFM are sponsoring the lecture "Budgeting: What's the Big Deal?!" from 3:30 to 5 p.m. today in Union 203 as part of the Money Matters lecture series.

The lecture will be the third in the four-part series. Past speakers have addressed issues such as how to avoid debt and income-generating ideas.

Speaker for the event will be Michelle Krehbiel, a Division of Cooperative Extension agent in family and consumer science.

"We will talk about how to make a budget, which is a crucial subject for college students," she said.

Krehbiel said college students should learn about budgeting their money because of the constant problem of never having enough.

"College kids talk about money every hour of the day," she said. "Everybody has some goals and, in this society, it takes money to reach most of them."

Krehbiel said spending habits begin early in life, with a person's spending and budgeting habits forming as early as age five.

"How we spend money shows our values in life," Krehbiel said.

During the presentation, there will be time to look at and plan a personal budget.

The lecture is open to students or Manhattan residents.

Krehbiel said one reason for offering this class to such a wide variety of people is that the same problems are faced by all age groups.

One problem that Krehbiel noted was spending vs. savings.

"Most people spend as much as they make," she said. "Even when you make a higher salary, people then will spend their money on more expensive items such as cars."

James Ragan Jr., professor of economics, said savings are lower than they used to be. However, savings now are in the positive numbers because of a refiguring of the government's formula for determining savings.

"Government has been measuring savings incorrectly," Ragan said.

Ragan said there were a couple of flaws in the system that figures savings rates, with one of the biggest being that the government had failed to count retirement savings for government workers as personal savings.

These changes took the nation's savings numbers out of the negative and into the positive a couple of months ago.

When it comes to spending, Ragan said it is important to keep in mind the importance of the item for which you are paying.

"Are people investing wisely in things such as education?" he said. "That is just one simplistic way of looking at the situation."

Following this lecture, there will be one event left in the Money Matters series: "Enough Already!" at 3:30 p.m. Nov. 16 in Union 203. The subject of the event will be trying to simplify life in a consumer culture.

Mutual funds can meet variety of investment goals

As we've discussed before, mutual funds are a simple and inexpensive method to start investing, especially for investors who cannot commit the time or have little interest in committing the time and effort required to make individual investment decisions. However, even with the advantages of diversification and professional management, some research is required to select the mutual fund that best fits your investment objectives.

Mutual funds are offered by a number of financial services companies, such as banks, brokerages, exclusively mutual-fund companies, and sometimes units of insurance companies. Although most of these funds are well-managed, I would recommend starting with funds offered by a mutual-fund company. These companies not only manage investments as their primary business but also offer a much wider variety of mutual funds from which to select. Most mutual-fund companies also offer special advantages to customers who have substantial sums invested, such as discounts on front-end fees or other expenses. Although not immediately available, they can prove valuable as your investments grow.

Selecting a mutual fund in which to invest requires an understanding of your investment objectives. If you plan to have a short-term need for your invested funds, anything less than four years, municipal or government bond funds should offer a reasonable return with minimal risk.

If you plan to invest for the long term, you likely will want funds that carry additional risk, such as aggressive growth or international/emerging market funds.

However, always remember that mutual funds carry no guarantee for success. Thus, remember one of the basic investment tenets, even when investing in mutual funds: never invest more than you can afford to lose.

Mutual-fund fees, both management and investment fees, always are a concern. All mutual funds with which I am familiar charge management fees for fund expenses, paid as a percentage of the fund's assets, usually between .25 percent and 1 percent, paid annually.

Many mutual funds also charge sales fees, better known as front- or back-end charges. Mutual funds with front-end fees deduct a specified percentage from your initial investment before investing your money. Mutual funds with back-end fees charge a specific percentage against your investment's value when you sell shares of the fund. Funds that charge neither front- nor back-end fees are known as no-load funds.

Hundreds of studies have been done on the effect of a fund's fee structure as a predictor of its performance. These studies generally have shown no difference between no-load funds and funds that charge a front- or back-end fee; the investment performance of each essentially is similar. Thus, except for the reduction in your initial investment, the investment-fee structure of a fund makes no difference on its long-term investment performance.

On the other hand, a strong correlation between investment performance and management fees has been identified. If all mutual funds are divided into quarters by the percentage of assets they charge shareholders as management fees, funds with the highest management fees often prove to underperform an average of all funds.

Conversely, mutual funds with the lowest management fees tend to perform the best of any of the four groups. The magnitude of the difference indicates that the advantage of low-fee funds over high-fee funds is traced to investment performance, not simply the difference in the funds' respective fee percentages.

As a general rule, then, we want to invest in funds with low management fees, ideally less than 0.5 percent of assets.

Many mutual funds issue shares of various classes, such as an A class, B class, X class and Z class, although the specific designations might vary. The X and Z class shares often are reserved for institutional investors (banks, insurance companies, etc.) and mutual funds of mutual funds whose mantra is extreme diversification. The other classes, A and B, are those in which we are interested.

Generally, A shares are designed for long-term investors and B shares for short-term investors. A shares usually carry a higher front-end charge but lower management fees. B shares tend to carry a low or no initial sales charge but higher management fees. The difference is in the running cost of investment: with a higher management-fee rate, the fees paid by investing in B shares eventually will overtake the fees paid by investing in A shares. The point at which B shares become more expensive then A shares often is between five and seven years after investment. If you plan to invest for five years, consider a fund's B shares, and if you are investing for retirement or a long-term objective, look for the fund's A shares.

Mutual funds can provide diversification through the fund's investment in a number of different stocks and bonds or through investing in different types of mutual funds. However, not all mutual funds offered by mutual-fund companies are sufficiently different to constitute diversification among funds.

Let's consider Janus Funds. A close inspection of Janus' funds shows that many of them are heavily invested in the same stocks.

Thus, a market downturn in a particular class of investments likely will have a strong effect on all of Janus' funds, rather than just one or two.

You need to make sure that when investing in different funds, the funds are invested in different stocks. Otherwise, there is no point in buying other funds.

Thus, just as individual stock investments, it remains necessary to research a fund to find any warning signs that a fund might not be as safe as it appears to be. All of this information is available upon request from a mutual-fund company.

"Right now we have just been designing and making different options for the chamber," McNabb said.

The team members also will take part in the Mars Simulation Chamber programmable controller training session. They will learn about a programmable laser chip, McNabb said.

"We will be doing PLC training at the space center," he said. "We will use it in the control system in the chamber."

The team will work on its proposal at NASA all week and will travel back to Salina on Saturday.

McNabb said he was excited about the trip because the team also will get to tour some of the NASA facilities while in Florida.

"The tours are going to be nice," Mulder said. "Also, it will be nice to see if the project will work on the chamber."

The law says state employees must wait two years before getting a contract if they were involved in drafting it.

The newspaper said it's unknown whether Glasscock was involved in drafting the contract. He declined to comment, and Gordon did not return phone calls.

Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka, said he believes the law may have been violated. He has called for further investigation.

Secretary of Administration Dan Stanley has said the agreement violated state statues because it was written up as a grant — when it really was a contract — and that no-bid contracts have to be approved by the Department of Administration. This contract had no approval from that department.

Gordon set up the agreement with Glasscock by establishing a Fellowship for Innovation in Public Policy.

Under the fellowship, Glasscock was paid $135,000 in a lump sum.

Gordon resigned after a newspaper report detailed her taxpayer-paid travel expenses and the contract she awarded to Glasscock.

Graves ordered the contract terminated. Attorneys for the aging agency notified Glasscock to reimburse the state $90,000.

Glasscock submitted paperwork that indicated he had spent $69,091, according to the records.

Under the contract, Glasscock was to conduct a three-year evaluation of the department and recommend changes in the way it operated.

In his work product, Glasscock said government was losing touch with its constituency because it moved slowly while society changed quickly.

He fashioned a priority outcomes budget, in which the department's budget would be driven by the needs of constituents rather than based on the previous year's funding level.

And he envisioned an innovation center where agency employees would spend one hour per week and generate new ideas.

"Believe it or not, these are the first major changes in government infrastructure in 100 years," he wrote.

The department's budget request for fiscal year 2001 includes a 20-plus page report by Glasscock, entitled, "A Critical Look Into the Future."

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., will deliver the 117th Landon Lecture at 10:30 p.m. Dec. 1 in McCain Auditorium. Hyde was scheduled for Nov. 5, but was forced to reschedule because of the extended congressional session.

K-State student sustains injuries after being struck by car Monday

BY SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A pedestrian was struck by a vehicle Monday afternoon near the K-State Student Union.

Megan Richeson, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, was walking in the crosswalk on the east side of the Union when she was hit by an oncoming car.

Michelle Hanson, senior in accounting, witnessed the accident.

"I was walking along, and I heard this boom, and I saw a girl hitting the ground," she said. "People were all around her yelling, 'Don't move, don't move.'"

Officer Mary Williamson presided over the scene of the accident.

Williamson said Richeson had a bump on the right side of her head and a possible leg injury.

Richeson was taken by ambulance to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue.

Eli Seeley, Richeson's nurse, said she is in good condition. "She suffered from some face and leg injuries," he said. "She's being X-rayed, but there are no serious injuries yet."

Seeley said Richeson probably would be released from the hospital sometime Monday evening.

Tammy Zuhars, senior in business and management marketing, was in the car directly behind the car that hit Richeson. She said she left her car on the street to find help.

"It was right in the middle of a class change, and it was pretty chaotic," she said. "I ran inside to the Information Counter in the Union to have them call someone, but I think someone had already gotten help."

David Dupler, senior in business, also witnessed the accident. He said it did not look like the driver of the car was speeding.

"The girl stepped into the crosswalk and it looked like he was picking people up," he said. "He was sort of slowed down and then he went.

"She hit the hood of the car and rolled off the front," Dupler said.

The driver of the car declined comment.

Israel, Palestine establish deadline to outline elusive peace deal

BY LAURA KING
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Setting a breathtakingly ambitious 100-day deadline to craft the broad outlines of a peace that has eluded them for a half century, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators launched landmark talks Monday with handshakes, smiles — and frank acknowledgments that great gaps divide them.

The convening of so-called final-status negotiations in the West Bank town of Ramallah marked the first real attempt by Israel's new government and the Palestinian leadership to grapple with the most contentious issues bedeviling the peace process: the borders of a future Palestinian state, the fate of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, what will happen to millions of Palestinian refugees and, above all, the status of Jerusalem.

Facing one another across a broad tabletop in a marble-floored conference room in the West Bank's swankiest hotel, the two delegations — led respectively by a seasoned Israeli diplomat and a one-time guerrilla fighter turned Palestinian Cabinet minister — spent 75 minutes behind closed doors, then emerged, saying their goal of a framework agreement by mid-February was difficult, but achievable.

The very length and intractability of their dispute, both sides suggested, had led to an intimate grasp of the issues — and that could help speed talks meant to lead to a final peace accord just nine months into the new millennium.

"After several decades of conflict ... and negotiations for almost six years, all the problems between us are known," Oded Eran, the Israeli delegation chief, said at a joint news conference. Echoed Yasser Abed Rabbo, his Palestinian counterpart, said: "We are not here to invent a new basis for the process."

The talks — whose planned pace of two to three sessions a week in coming months would mark the most intensive and fast-paced negotiations since those leading to partial Palestinian autonomy in the West Bank and Gaza Strip more than five years ago — were shadowed by a bomb attack Sunday that injured 33 Israelis.

While no group has claimed responsibility for the pipe-bomb blasts, both sides at the Ramallah talks calmly acknowledged that progress on the peace front raises the specter of violence by those who seek to block an accord.

"(This threat) should motivate us to work hard to achieve peace," said Abed Rabbo, the Palestinian information minister. "We will not give them the chance (to disrupt the peace process) and we will not yield to their plans and schemes."

Despite expressions of good faith and goodwill — even from Abed Rabbo, who is known for sometimes fiery anti-Israeli rhetoric — both sides hewed to opening positions that have remained unchanged since 1993.

The Palestinians insist on an Israeli withdrawal from lands captured in the 1967 Mideast war — the West Bank, Gaza and east Jerusalem. Abed Rabbo said the Palestinians have the right to self-determination and that millions of Palestinian refugees must be allowed to return or be given compensation.

Abed Rabbo also demanded a halt to Jewish settlement-building, denouncing it as the principal obstacle to peace.

Eran, for his part, said Israel would never agree to giving up part of Jerusalem — which both sides claim as their capital — or to withdrawing to the 1967 borders. He insisted a majority of the 200,000 Jewish settlers in the West Bank and Gaza must remain under Israeli sovereignty.

About a mile from the hotel, Jewish settlers staged a small demonstration urging Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak not to dismantle settlements as part of any accord. Palestinians, meanwhile, rallied in the West Bank town of Hebron to mark Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's still-unrealized 1988 declaration of Palestinian statehood.

"This rally is a celebration in support of our Palestinian state," said marcher Assad el-Joulani. "We have the right to dream of a state and a capital like the rest of the world."

Even before the opening of these talks, Barak had set a timetable calling for the broad outlines of an agreement — a so-called framework accord — to be reached by mid-February. Eran expressed determination to meet that deadline.

Judge in Microsoft case faces many options after ruling company used unfair practices

BY TED BRIDIS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The judge behind the blistering ruling against Microsoft Corporation didn't question the honesty of Bill Gates outright, but he rejected almost every explanation of events offered under oath by the world's most famous billionaire.

The lack of faith U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson showed in Microsoft could hurt chances for a less-severe punishment — or even for a settlement offer — that relied on a company pledge of some future behavior toward rivals in the technology industry.

The judge could order remedies up to or including a breakup of the company in the next phase of the case unless a settlement is agreed to in the meantime.

Time and again, the judge embraced the government's version of key events and Microsoft's motivations in last Friday's antitrust ruling.

In one of its most sensational claims during the lawsuit, the Justice Department said Microsoft quietly met with software rival Netscape to illegally divide the market, a charge Gates himself called an outrageous lie.

The judge called the offer an effort to persuade Netscape to structure its business such that the company would not distribute platform-level browsing software for Windows.

He didn't believe Microsoft's version of events throughout his ruling.

"That's the implication," said Robert Litan, a former senior Justice official now at the Brookings Institution. "He didn't come out and say it, but if you read between the lines, that's certainly what he ended up deciding."

"It's clear he didn't think they had much (credibility)," said Marc Schildkraut, a former Federal Trade Commission official who questioned Gates during negotiations with Microsoft in the early 1990s in the FTC's antitrust investigation. "The findings are very one-sided. It's a tough row for them to hoe on that ground."

Microsoft declined to comment on inferences the judge didn't find its witnesses truthful.

But the company's renowned aggressiveness — and the implication that executives bent the truth under oath — could hurt the chances for negotiating a settlement or escaping with moderate conduct-remedy penalties — enforced promises not to behave in certain ways.

Hiring freeze halts faculty raises

■ Move in response to request by Graves to reduce spending.

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

A budget request to raise K-State employee salaries during the next fiscal year could be a difficult task, said Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance.

"Right now, it does not look like the money is going to be there, but we'll continue to pursue it," Rawson said. "It's in real jeopardy."

The concern was brought up when Gov. Bill Graves recommended to reduce State General Fund allocations by 1 percent this fiscal year. Graves must present the Legislature with an ending balance of 7.5 percent in revenue by the end of this fiscal year. To reach this balance, Rawson said Kansas must cut spending to be in performance with state law.

Graves asked all state agencies to implement a 90-day hiring freeze on certain human resource positions which started Monday. Rawson said that due to the freeze, vacant positions at K-State can't be filled for a period of 90 days through employment or promotion. Instead, those with current jobs could in addition assume the vacant position but not receive a pay raise.

Although the hiring freeze is a recommendation, Rawson said all state agencies are complying with Grave's request. For the proposal to be enforced, he said the freeze must be passed as a law when state legislators meet in early January.

In addition, K-State has to give back 1 percent of its budget at the end of the fiscal year, because the Legislature received less money than it should have, said Gary Leitnaker, director of human resources.

John Struve, budget office director, said there is no law enforcing these proposals.

"In effect, this is a tool to help reach the 1-percent reduction," Struve said. "Anything receiving state funding will be affected by this, but it still has to be approved."

Rawson said the recession of the State General Fund requires an allocation of about $43 million from state agencies. For K-State, a $1.5 million contribution is necessary for the reduction.

Marion Gray, Faculty Senate president, said the 90-day freeze should be seen as a bigger picture. He said the immediate effect will be seen if an important clerical worker resigns.

Another effect that possibly could result is a drop in faculty morale, Gray said. Salary raises were intended for classified and non-classified personnel, which includes professors and janitors, but excludes those in higher administrative positions.

Explicit e-mail messages spur investigation

By TRACY DOILE
Kansas State Collegian

Sexually explicit e-mails have been sent to as many as 60 K-State women, resulting in 13 criminal reports. A subject calling himself "Matt" named each of the victims and claimed he had them in class or knew them another way.

WHAT*to*DO

If you receive a sexually explicit e-mail:

■ Do not reply or engage in any type of dialogue with the sender.
■ Do not delete it. Save the message. The header might contain important information.
■ Report questionable e-mails to abuse@ksu.edu.

The official reports were made to the K-State Police on Monday. Sgt. Troy Lane of the campus police said these reports only are a few of many actual incidents.

"In following up on these, we've discovered that there could have been as many as 60 other victims," he said. "I've been contacting further reports."

The 60 victims have surfaced only in the past couple of days, Lane said. The recent reports aren't the first, however.

"We had three or four made last month," Lane said.

Sarah Maximuk, senior in construction science, received a sexually explicit e-mail Oct. 13. She said she was in the engineering computer lab when she found it. Coincidentally, Sara Drake, junior in elementary education and a member of Maximuk's sorority house, also was in the lab and had received the same e-mail. The two compared the e-mails and found they practically were the same, almost word for word.

The e-mail contained lines such as, "All I ask is to spend a few hours with you some night. A few hours in a million."

Marrow drive offers chance to save lives

By KATIE LAUX
Kansas State Collegian

K-Staters pull together to help each other, and the Mike Meier Memorial Bone Marrow Drive does just that, said Mitzi Frieling, KSU Alumni Association assistant director of student and out-of-state programs.

■ BE A DONOR
The bone-marrow drive is from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union's Little Theatre. Donors must be from 18 to 59 years old.

The bone-marrow drive at K-State was set up by the family of Meier, a K-State graduate who died while in need of a bone-marrow transplant in 1992. Meier's family set up a memorial fund to support the drive, and the Alumni Association helps fund it.

The drive is from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m. today in Union Little Theatre.

The donation process is free to all donors. Once people complete the donation process, they never need to re-register, said Diane Lux, manager of donor recruitment for the Heart of America donor registry in Kansas City, Mo. People only need to update their registration with changes of address or phone number.

"The bone-marrow drive is a chance for one person to save another person's life, and the process is very simple," Frieling said.

Man vows to stay in town after alleged dognapping

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

It has been said that a dog is man's best friend. If this saying is true, then that special bond has been tragically ripped asunder for Edward Bullock.

■ HAVE INFO?
To report information about the stolen dog contact the Riley County Police Department at 537-2112 or the Manhattan Animal Shelter at 603 Levee Drive.

Bullock's dog, Jet, a yellow Labrador retriever weighing around 100 pounds, disappeared while he was shopping inside ALCO Discount Store. Bullock said he left the dog in his van with the windows rolled down. The dog jumped out and sat in front of the store, where two men allegedly captured the dog in order to take it to the animal shelter.

"A lady and two 14-year-old kids said the car just took off with him," Bullock said. "The men drug my dog to the vehicle, and the dog was very reluctant to go. The lady and kids overheard them say they were going to take it to the pound. Two days later, they still haven't taken the dog to the pound."

Although Bullock said he does not know why the dog

1960s marked by fire, start of rebuilding

STORY BY JENN DAVOREN

At 2 a.m. on Dec. 13, 1968, a telephone ring woke the wife of former K-State Vice President Clyde Jones from a sound sleep. Jones, who said he was battling a nasty case of pneumonia at the time, also was jolted awake by his wife's nervous description of the call.

"A quiet, deliberate voice said, 'We're gonna burn you, baby,' and hung up," Jones said. "A few other university officials got that same call that night."

The reason for the late-night ringing remained a mystery until later that morning, when Jones was told the work of arsonists had led to the complete destruction of Nichols Gymnasium.

"It didn't have a chance"

Jones might have missed the burning of Nichols Gymnasium, but thousands of spectators — Manhattan residents as well as students — turned out during the wee hours of the morning to watch flames engulf the stately structure.

One student who witnessed the fire from its slow beginning to its smoldering end was Manhattan City Commissioner and K-State alumnus Ed Klimek, who served as program director for the student radio station, KSDB-FM 91.9, during the fall of 1968. Klimek said he first caught sight of the fire as he was returning from Ahearn Field House after the end of the annual Sunflower Doubleheader, an event that pitted the University of Kansas' and K-State's men's basketball teams against non-conference teams.

"I walked over to Nichols to check on the night D.J. after the game," Klimek said. "I saw that these wooden platforms, which were used as flooring for the gym floor, were on fire, but not the building itself."

The platforms had been stacked up against Nichols' north entrance in 5- or 6-foot piles before being set on fire, Klimek said. It later was revealed that the wood had been soaked in gasoline to aid in the rapid spread of the flames.

Klimek said he had turned to seek help when the K-State Student Fire Department, then housed in the University Power Plant, pulled up to the gymnasium. K-State was not under official fire protection from the city until the 1970s, and the student force was the university's first line of defense against fire. However, as student firefighters turned their hoses to the burning wooden platforms, the fire spread to Nichols' large wooden doors.

"With a gas-induced fire, gas burns at the top of the flame," Klimek said. "When the hoses hit the fire, it pushed it back to the doors of the gym and then into the building."

As the flames quickly spread through the gymnasium, the Manhattan Fire Department was called in for assistance. However, the wooden infrastructure of the 57-year-old building proved to be the perfect fuel for the growing fire. After spreading across the gymnasium floor and up the walls of the building, the fire came in contact with the second-floor running track, which was oiled daily to protect the wood.

Klimek said that as the flames spread, the fire took on the appearance of a gas range as the flames spread in a circle to completely consume the track and spread to other areas of the building.

Although the situation was becoming increasingly dangerous, Klimek said he still worried about the student disc jockey who possibly could be trapped in the third-floor radio station.

"I tried to go up the front stairs and make my way up to the station, but a firefighter

Education department nears deal for copyright problems

TOPEKA — Education Commissioner Andy Tompkins said Tuesday his department is close to resolving copyright problems with science testing standards that de-emphasize evolution.

During a break at the State Board of Education's monthly meeting, Tompkins said he hopes the board will be able to vote on the revised standards next month.

Three Department of Education staffers and a science teacher are rewriting the standards so they don't violate copyright law.

"We're close," Tompkins said. "We've tried to rephrase it."

Board Chairwoman Linda Holloway, of Shawnee, said she's not sure the standards will be ready in time for the Dec. 7-8 meeting.

American Royal takes heat for slaughter of prized lamb

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Skidgee's gone to slaughter, but for the American Royal, the issue is dying a slow death.

Staff with the American Royal, one of the nation's premier livestock exhibitions, were swamped Monday with phone calls after several radio disc jockeys encouraged people to protest the livestock show's decision to slaughter Skidgee, a championship lamb.

"We're made out as the bad guys here," American Royal spokeswoman Colleen Scott said. "But this hurts the whole livestock industry. There is this whole uproar of people who don't understand that these people raise animals to sell them. This is how they make their money."

Trouble began when Bebe Kemper — wife of Kansas City banker R. Crosby Kemper Jr. — bid a record $23,500 Saturday night for the championship lamb, hoping to return it to 12-year-old Jill Elswick of Albia, Iowa, who had raised the animal.

But rules are rules, and the American Royal has a particularly harsh one: Any animals auctioned must be slaughtered.

Buyers either can take the meat for personal consumption, donate it to charity or sell it on the open market. The youths showing their animals benefit from any sale proceeds.

American Royal officials said they gave Jill the option to give back the $23,500 and keep her championship lamb. She kept the cash.

There are several reasons American Royal rules require auctioned animals to be slaughtered. One is that officials carefully screen championship livestock for any hormones or drugs that could be used to unfairly enhance the animal and possibly pose a danger to the food supply.

Truck driver dies, 6 injured when train hits dump truck

ACTON, Ontario — A high-speed Amtrak passenger train carrying 37 passengers crashed into a dump truck Tuesday, killing the truck driver and causing slight injuries to six passengers.

The crash of a Chicago-bound train knocked the train's locomotive onto its side and sent four passenger cars off the rails at a road crossing near Acton, 12 miles west of Toronto.

"The driver of the truck is dead as a result of the collision, and six passengers were taken to hospital with minor injuries," Sgt. Frank Phillips of Halton Region police said.

The Amtrak train was operating under a contract with Via Rail Canada Inc.

Report says Iowa septuplets have problems with health

DES MOINES, Iowa — Two of the McCaughey septuplets have developmental problems that affect their ability to walk, the Ladies' Home Journal reports.

As they approach their second birthday, Brandon, Joel, Kenny, Kelsey and Natalie — who like their two other siblings were born Nov. 19, 1997 — all are talking and walking.

But Nathan's lower body and leg muscles have been rigid since birth, the magazine said in its December issue. And Alexis has little strength in her trunk.

Neither can walk or sit up without help.

Last month, the Journal said, doctors diagnosed Alexis with hypotonic quadriplegia, a disorder that causes weakness in all four limbs. Nathan was diagnosed with spastic diplegia, which causes uncontrolled muscle tightening in his legs.

Tests found that both children have underdeveloped areas in their brains.

Therapists work with the children two days a week.

"You never want your kids to have to face anything hard, but at the same time, it could be a lot worse," Bobbi McCaughey, the children's mother, said. "If they do their therapy and exercise, it won't get any worse than it is now, and it could get much better."

Both toddlers wear plastic leg braces to bend their ankles and stretch their back leg muscles.

Nathan gets around the family's five-bedroom home in Carlisle with what his mother calls a "scooch," a half-crawl on his belly. Alexis pushes herself with her legs while lying on her back.

Alexis and her sister Natalie also suffer from digestive problems that cause them to vomit frequently.

Some of the septuplets have other relatively minor health concerns. Kenny may need glasses, and Joel probably will undergo surgery to correct a muscle condition that causes one of his eyes to drift and cross.

Sudden exercise could pose heart risk to couch potatoes

CHICAGO — Overweight, sedentary people should take it slow to avoid heart attacks when they finally get off the couch and start exercising.

A study found that people who are extremely inactive are more than 30 times more likely to have a heart attack during exertion than at any other time. Those who are just plain inactive are 21 times more likely.

"If you don't get much exercise and you're middle-aged with a lot of risk factors, you ought to be pretty careful about picking up that snow shovel," said Dr. Paul Thompson, one of the authors of the study in today's Journal of the American Medical Association.

The warning shouldn't be construed as an excuse to avoid exercise, the researchers said.

Out-of-shape people should begin exercise with caution and check with their doctors first, said Thompson and Dr. James Fletcher, a cardiologist with the Mayo Clinic in Jacksonville, Fla.

"Long-term, carefully done exercise is very good and prevents heart attacks," said Fletcher, who wasn't involved in the study. "The problem is a small number of people who become enthusiastic and decide to jump in there."

NICHOLS

stopped me," Klimek said. "I have the claim to fame as being the last person in Nichols, besides the firefighter that motioned me out."

Klimek said the disc jockey was one of the first people in Nichols to notice the fire, and promptly ended his broadcast to escape the building.

Student and city firefighters worked through the night and into the next morning, even though 15-degree temperatures caused water to freeze immediately upon hitting the ground. However, as the roof collapsed, the growing crowd began to lose hope that the structure could be salvaged.

"In just a short period of time, the whole thing was engulfed," Klimek said.

Students returning from the Sunflower Doubleheader were given their second show of the evening as crowds gathered around Nichols to witness the destruction.

Bill Stallard, a 1970 K-State graduate, served as KSDB's sports director during fall 1968. Stallard had returned to his fraternity house for the evening when he heard the news of the fire.

"We were sitting in the basement of the Sigma Nu house when somebody came downstairs screaming and yelling," Stallard said. "We went out on the sundeck of the house, and during the winter without the trees to block the view, it was unbelievable."

K-State alumna Bev Davis said she and a group of friends, upon hearing of the fire, traveled to the Top of the World, off Seth Child Road, to watch the show.

"We heard about Nichols burning, and we decided to drive up there for a better view. In my mind's eye, I can still see the flames," Davis said. "The embers just shot straight up. You could see the fire against the black sky for miles."

Stallard said he and his friends knew Nichols was a lost cause as they watched the flames glow out of every door and window.

"It didn't have a chance, the fire was so intense," he said.

The Aftermath

The losses due to the fire were emotional as well as monetary, Klimek said.

A $27,000 transmitter was unsalvageable, as well as every other piece of equipment the station used. However, sympathy for the student station's plight quickly spread across the state, and donations of space and equipment were sent to K-State for use.

"K-MAN, the radio station downtown, allowed us to use a large auditorium in the back of their station," Klimek said. "It was left over from the days when radio was live, and they needed the space for performances."

Broadcasting from downtown with used equipment, the student D.J.s were happy to be back on the air but still remorseful for their losses.

"We never really did recover fully," Stallard said. "All of our equipment was brand new, and then we had to make use of all of the junk equipment. We were really limited on what we could do."

The Nichols Gymnasium fire dealt a serious blow not only to the radio-TV department but to K-State's music department as well. More than $500,000 worth of sheet music and instruments now were ash, which handed former band director Phil Hewitt a considerable problem. The only piece of music to survive the fire was "The Wabash Cannonball," which Hewitt had just purchased and tucked away in his briefcase the day before Nichols' arsonists struck.

The resourceful Hewitt was left with one week to teach the remaining piece to his band in order to be ready for an upcoming game. Using donated instruments, the K-State Marching Band made "Wabash" a crowd pleaser. The song now is a tradition at K-State football games.

Although the departments hurt by the fire were recovering, the university was left with the task of seeking out the fire's source. The Kansas Bureau of Investigation was called to Manhattan to determine the identity of the arsonists.

More than 200 students were questioned about the fire, but the culprits were never caught. The university began to employ fire guards, members of the ROTC program who patrolled the campus at night to control suspicious happenings.

The skeleton of Nichols would stand on the south edge of the campus for 15 years, as money wasn't available for the renovation or the razing of the structure. However, a $1.5 million appropriation in 1983 by the Kansas Legislature transformed the building into Nichols Hall, as K-State students know it today.

"It was an empty shell, but it was a historical building, and no one wanted to demolish it," Davis said. "It amazes me that they left it like that for so long, but it amazes me more that they rebuilt it."

Campus unrest

Many factors were cited as contributing to the Nichols' arson. The night before the blaze, university officials took part in a forum in the K-State Student Union in order to hear students' concerns.

"It was not a terribly rowdy sort of thing," Jones said. "One student made certain statements about burning buildings on campus, but he had an eye witness that talked with him as they were taking a bus out of town."

Klimek said the "Campus Free-For-All," as students who attended the forum had dubbed it, was only a small part of a larger problem.

"There was some association there, but there were other factors," Klimek said. "The mentality of torching buildings was there."

Stallard said general campus unrest was a common occurrence throughout the 1960s, and K-State was no exception. Worries beyond campus, such as the threat of being called to armed service, occupied the minds of many Manhattan men.

Extensive picketing of issues such as required enrollment in ROTC classes for men and the exclusion of women from this program occasionally escalated into harassment. In May 1967, a consistent problem was the harassment of ROTC members, who routinely were pelted with rotten eggs and manure.

"For the male gender, it was about making the grades and staying in school," Stallard said. "You had four years, eight semesters, and then you were gone."

The Manhattan fires didn't end after the Nichols blaze. In 1969, the Manhattan Country Club and the Chef Cafe on Fourth street also became victims of arson. A Manhattan resident was found with a can of gasoline and asbestos gloves outside of Kentucky Fried Chicken but never was convicted.

"This man had a very slick lawyer who got a change of venue to Clay Center," Jones said.

Even though the country club arsonist was never caught, Jones said a letter confessing to the crime was found in K-State's Chapel Auditorium.

"It was written in a very crude verse and bragged about burning the country club," he said.

Auditorium

The Nichols blaze was not the first time a campus building had fallen victim to arson. Less than four years earlier, student unrest led to the burning of the University Auditorium on Jan. 15, 1965.

Two students took the joking to heart. One evening, the students broke into the auditorium and started a fire among drama production props in the basement. The flames quickly engulfed the entire building.

Unlike the Nichols fire, the arsonists quickly were taken into custody and charged for the fire.

"They honestly thought they had done everyone a favor," Miller said. "These particular students thought it would be replaced, but the university had to do without an auditorium for quite a while."

This was the second of the K-State music department's great losses, with eleven pianos and more than 200 student instruments reduced to ash. Music classes were redirected to the garage in the Military Science Building, two classrooms in Eisenhower Hall and East Stadium.

Mesolow

Arson was not the only type of disaster that kept K-State officials on their toes during this time. On June 8, 1966, a series of tornadoes swept through Manhattan and Topeka, leaving a damage path of more than $3 million.

The storm that caused the most damage in Manhattan later was termed a mesolow, a low-pressure air mass that in turn creates tornadoes.

Students who were hardest hit by the weather were those residing in the Jardine Terrace Apartments, which sustained damage in 22 of its 24 buildings, and those involved in agricultural projects.

Two hay sheds, three machine sheds, two research buildings, eight grain bins and a house completely were destroyed by the storm. Poultry areas were stripped of more than 1,000 birds killed in the tornado, and high winds contaminated countless projects, including those involving water purity and the crossing of seed lines.

"We benefited in a strange way later," Jones said. "Washburn was also hit, and they used mobile facilities as classrooms while they rebuilt. We were able to pick them up to use later."

1960-1969 Campus facts

Athletics

■ The men's basketball team enjoyed success in the early part of the decade. In the 1960-61 season, K-State coach Tex Winter led the Cats to a 13-1 record in conference play. With Winter as coach, the Cats won 20 straight home games, and the team's only conference loss was against the University of Kansas. The two teams would end the season tied for the conference title. The Cats won four more Big 8 Conference titles during the 1960s.

■ In 1968, KSU Stadium was built as part of an effort to re-establish the football team. During the decade, the team won just 18 football games, including three seasons in which it finished winless. Doug Weaver had a record of 8-60-1 as head coach in the early 1960s.

■ One of the university's few bright spots in football was against the University of Oklahoma on Oct. 25, 1969. The Cats defeated Oklahoma 56-21, and the game shook the college football world. However, just when it looked like the program might emerge from futility, it was placed on three-year probation.

Residence hall construction

■ In the 1960s, K-State saw a 75-percent increase in enrollment, and five residence halls were built as a result. In 1960, Goodnow Hall was opened for men, and two years later West Hall was built. In 1965, Moore Hall was constructed with the Derby Dining Center. Two years later, Haymaker and Ford halls were opened.

Tornadoes rip through the heartland

■ A tornado ripped through the campus on June 8, 1966. The storm caused extensive damage, and some said it was the greatest damage ever done to the university. K-State was forced to look for funding to rebuild, and the university received $1 million in state funds.

K-State celebrates centennial year

■ 1963 was the university's centennial anniversary, and the Kansas State Collegian produced a special section commemorating the event. The event came four years after the university had changed from being recognized as a college to a university.

Guest lecturers

■ The university worked during the 1960s, an era of change, to bring people who had made a difference in the country to the campus. K-State established the Landon Lecture series, with Alfred Landon giving the first lecture.

■ In 1968, Martin Luther King Jr. spoke to an assembled crowd inside Ahearn Field House, advocating changes throughout the country. The speech came months before his assassination.

■ In that same year, Robert Kennedy, a U.S. presidential candidate also gave a lecture at Ahearn. He spoke about the conflict in Vietnam, and said it was time for students to help change the world. Kennedy later would be assassinated while campaigning.

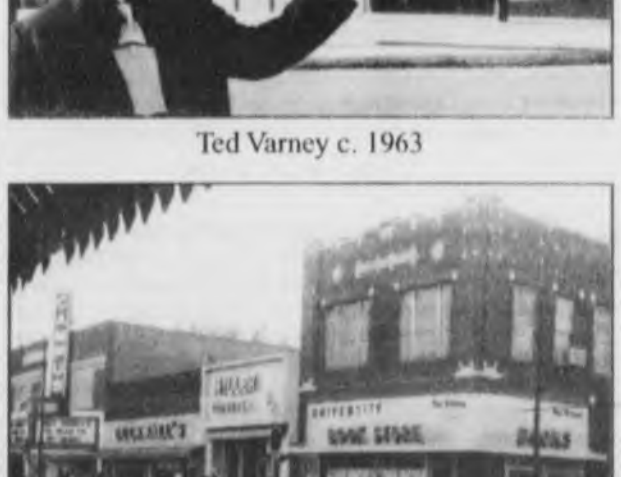
Varney's Book Store
1960-1969



Ted Varney's College Book Store became the University Book Store, Inc. as K-State attained its new status from "college" to "university."

In 1963, Varney's dug a new retail area to the west of the store and moved all the books downstairs. It doubled the retail space, plus gave them a nice ground-level parking lot behind the store!

Funding debate shows SGA hunger for power

Student Governing Association is famous for claiming it wants to empower students. It's just too bad it doesn't mean it the way it sounds.

Judging from pending legislation recommending the restructuring of Fine Arts Council, it appears Student Senate just wants to empower itself.

Last month, Senate failed to pass a bill that took allocation power from the council and gave it to Senate's Allocations Committee. Since then, a member of Senate and the Fine Arts Council who supported the original bill, Ted Conrad, helped devise a compromise bill with the help of the Allocation and Privilege Fee committees and the council. The bill sucks power from council members and gives power, in essence, to senators and appointees of the student body president.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

Simplistically, the new bill is a second attempt from a different angle to do the same thing in an underhanded way.

The council now is composed of nine students. Five of those are elected members from the student body at large, and four are appointed — two by the student body president and two by the Senate chair from the student body at large.

The new proposal also puts nine students on the council. Two would be elected by the student body, four would be appointed by the student body president and most likely be members of the president's cabinet, and the remaining three would be senators appointed by the Senate chair. With the proposed changes, the council would be basically SGA and two students who actually are interested in the arts and not in packing their résumés.

Senators wonder why they have a reputation for being elitists. Maybe they get the reputation because they systematically take power from students who aren't otherwise involved and centralize that power within SGA. Maybe it is their blatant need to make campus organizations more incestuous and eliminate new blood. At least, that's what they did last year to the Union Activities Board and what they are attempting to do with the Fine Arts Council. Let's hope this new attempt fails, lest all campus organizations be run by the same group of students.

Quest for Unconditional love

Latest round in dating game of life yields no winners, inspires search for cats

Right up front I'll apologize for the horribly personal, ragingly non-topical and overall self-centered nature of this column. I have heard the outcry from readers, wanting to read columns about "issues" and "stuff." But you know, I am a tired, embittered woman as of late, and I say, "The world's ills? Political issues? Screw it all. It's Brandi time."

There's something about my relationships with men that is not unlike other people's relationships to Lay's Potato Chips. Or pure, uncut cocaine. I like me some boys, despite the lesbian overtones my life has. (We were drunk when we all took that bath together, I swear!).

This summer I decided I needed to work men out of my life altogether. I still was lamenting the fact that I had dumped a dapper boyfriend, and the weekend of my 21st birthday was all the convincing I needed to swear off men for a goodly while.

Because, as the Def Leppard song goes, "Love biiites, love bleeeeeds, it's bringing me to my kneeeeeees, hyuah." If life has taught me anything, it is that falling in love always ends in flames and carnage, with people crawling away Civil War style. I am a firm believer in the revised adage, "It's sure as hell better never to have loved and never to have lost than to have loved and had your heart ripped out and spat upon like some 19th-century cobblestone sidewalk."

But then, there I was in Auntie Mae's Parlor a few months ago, minding my own as it were, when I spotted a boyfriend from many a year before. I chose only to wave, but suddenly he was there at my side. A few weeks later I did what stupid girls do and threw my values out the window. I decided I was in love. Bad, bad, bad. So very bad. He said he was in love, too, then moved to Wisconsin to get a Ph.D. And there we were, 700 miles apart and in love. So very smooth.

We fight a lot, which is so reminiscent of our relationship in 1993. He makes me cry a lot, and about every time we fight, he tells me he's not sure if he loves me anymore. All my friends tell me I should just break up with him. Now when I say something about him, they ALL give me this look. And here's where the potato chip/cocaine analogy comes into play. I just cannot do it. I cannot break up with him, partly because I am paralyzed with fear that I'll be making the same mistake I made with Mr. Dapper, and boy howdy, I cannot live through something like that again.

The opportunity to end the relationship came on Sunday afternoon, however; only he was the one on the verge of dumping me. After saying many a not-so-nicety, he said it again, "I'm not sure if I love you." Only this time when he said it, for some reason, it was different. I hung up the phone, then went to lay on the bathroom floor for a bit, crying hysterically. By the way — I handle things of this nature about as well as I would handle being hit repeatedly in the face with a blunt object. So I did what every red-blooded American woman would do — I bought a Rammstein album.

Upon talking to him later, he apologized and reassured me of his love and what have you. But he's not happy in the relationship, either, and he doesn't know why. Or so he says. So, I suppose it'll go on like this until the end of next summer, when I'll either move up there to go to graduate school, or move to Germany to go to school there. The more I think about it, the more I realize I am the perfect example of what women should not do. I generally am not a happy person to begin with, and this little situation certainly does not help.

My friend Amy asked me what I really wanted from the relationship, and the answer was simple. I want what Mr. Dapper gave me before I so stupidly dumped him — unconditional love. I suppose that's what anyone really wants in a relationship, although saying that makes me feel like some sort of pathetic puppy ridden with mange. "Love me, love me. I'm gross, but love me."

Then again, perhaps a life as a spinster with 43 cats living with me in an abandoned Victorian-era house won't be so bad. I've always wanted to go officially crazy. Heh, heh.

Microsoft's success earned through shrewd deals, quality products

With the recent U.S. Justice Department ruling against Microsoft Corporation, a few things need to be said on Microsoft's behalf. First, I would like to point out nobody handed Bill Gates the fortune he amassed. Microsoft became the empire it is for two important reasons.

The first reason is that Bill Gates made some smart decisions with the licensing of Microsoft software. Instead of selling MS-DOS to IBM, Microsoft retained ownership and received a license fee for every computer system sold with its operating system. Gates changed the course of history with that deal.

The second reason Microsoft has done so well is it publishes outstanding software. I know a lot of people are snickering at that last comment, but I stand by it. Microsoft Office is a great suite of applications. Maybe it is not as user-friendly as the WordPerfect Suite, but it is nowhere near as buggy either.

Internet Explorer and Outlook Express is the best Web browser and mail client I have ever used. I went from Mosaic and Eudora to Netscape Navigator and Netscape Messenger, but I found in the end that Microsoft made a better product.

There isn't a better consumer operating system in the world than Windows. Some might think that perhaps OS/2 makes a better product. Nope. I thought OS/2 was a nice operating system. However, no one supported it except IBM. It ran MS-DOS and Windows-based applications, but not as well as the Microsoft operating systems. Emulation is not a good thing.

How about the Macintosh Operating System? Is it better than Windows? Nope. The Mac Operating System does a good job of running on hardware manufactured by Apple. The same company develops the software and the hardware. It is easy to do one thing well when all you do is one thing.

Windows runs on hardware developed by thousands of different companies. The hardware in your system requires software written by the manufacturer to allow its device to communicate with the Windows operating system. Microsoft provides the manufacturer with guidelines and requirements for doing this, and in return, the hardware manufacturer provides Microsoft with a device driver for the operating system.

Many problems users experience with Windows are not Windows-based problems. Buggy device drivers provided by hardware companies account for the majority of these problems.

Finally, what about the Linux operating system? Is it better than Microsoft? Nope. Have you tried to install Linux? Say anything you like about Windows installations, but they are an absolute no-brainer when compared to the Linux operating system. Linux has a lot of strong points, but none as a consumer operating system.

The second-most abundant cause for user problems with Windows is the users themselves. Linux takes user-based problems to the next level of frustration with its difficult installation process. It has a long way to go to overcome that hurdle.

What else is there? Not much. Windows is the best choice. With that said, let me also say it is not the only choice. Microsoft does not have a monopoly. You can buy computer systems with or without the Microsoft system. Go to any local vendor and buy a custom-made PC with the operating system of your choice. Dell even sells a Linux-based PC.

Microsoft can appeal any ruling from District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson to the District of Columbia Circuit of Appeals. That court of appeals has supported Microsoft in the past and has reversed a previous injunction against Microsoft from Jackson. This isn't over yet.

I am all for competition, market fairness and choice, but in the end, most consumers will end up using the better product no matter how the product reached their desktop.

New utility poles worth expense with safety of students at stake

Editor,

I have driven down Claflin Road only to have someone walk out in front of me too many times. I know I am on a college campus, and I can accept people walking out into traffic. The only problem is when it is dark and I barely have time to see these people before I run them over. The worst spot on campus is in front of Weber Hall.

There are only four street lights spanning the area from from Mid-Campus Drive to Moore Hall. To top that off, these four lights are only on the north side of the street. I think that something has to be done.

I have talked to the K-State Division of University Physical Facilities, and I was told it would cost $1,500 to buy a light pole and another $500 to install it. Utilities could range from $15 to $25 a month. To put up four poles it would cost about $8,000 up front and $800 per year in electricity. Isn't this a small price to pay compared to having someone hit by a car? I would hope that our administration wants as safe of a campus as possible.

Honor system Web page provides information, commends faculty

Editor,

One of the most effective strategies for faculty to reduce incidencts of academic dishonesty in the classroom is to follow the 10 principles of academic integrity for faculty, found at the K-State Honor System Web site, www.ksu.edu/honor.

Public Speaking II students were asked to visit that Web site and name one of their professors who taught according to those principles. Those students who rose from the depths of mid-semester blues to respond named more than 25 K-State faculty and articulated the qualities that made them special. Those faculty now are listed at the above Web site at Honored Faculty.

There are, of course, many other faculty across the university who also exemplify those principles but do not have the fortune of Public Speaking II students in their classes.

If you believe one of your professors exemplifies some or all of those teaching integrity qualities, please visit our Web site and enter that information on the discussion board.

You also might use the site to comment on the honor system.

Molly Marshall, professor of theology at Central Baptist Seminary in Kansas City, Kan., speaks in the Union Little Theatre on Tuesday. Marshall is an advocate for women's equality in religion.

Women in religion face changing roles

BY KEVIN SELDERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Previous notions of religious authority are being re-examined as more women take on clergy roles.

Molly Marshall, professor of theology and spiritual formation at Central Baptist Seminary in Kansas City, Kan., spoke to an overflowing crowd Tuesday night in Union Little Theatre, on what she calls the second Reformation.

Her lecture "100 Percent Heaven Made? Religious Authority and Its Impact on Women" was given as part of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

Marshall said there has been a sharp rise in the number of women entering ordained ministry in recent decades, after centuries of male-dominated clergy.

"Today, there is a ferment in every religious tradition," Marshall said. "Women are claiming their religious rights everywhere."

In 1995, Marshall was forced to resign from her teaching position at Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville, Ky., due to her support of women having access to all areas of Baptist life, including the senior pastorate, a position now denied to women.

Her struggle for women's equality in religious authority was the focus of the recent PBS documentary "Battle for the Minds."

"Early church fathers spent a great deal of time blaming Eve for the entrance of sin."

— Molly Marshall, Lou Douglas lecturer

Marshall said women were seen as a potential corrupting influence by men in early Christian history.

"Early church fathers spent a great deal of time blaming Eve for the entrance of sin," she said.

"The opinion of women was very negative."

As women sought to fill clergy and teaching roles in the late 19th century, Marshall said there was a marginalization of women in the church.

"When a community of faith is first formed, the gifts of women are welcomed and celebrated," Marshall said. "But as movements become institutionalized, the potential of women as leaders is severely limited."

Marshall said feminist scholars recently have discovered that there were female priests, bishops and maybe even a female pope in the past.

Marshall said even though there is a mixed response to the growing equality between men and women in religious authority, change is inevitable.

"This sweep of Christian history and religious authority is being interrogated and being seen for what it was — a reflection of a particular context and not the voice of God," Marshall said.

Marshall's viewpoint was well received among many in attendance.

"Her viewpoint was good because she didn't completely bash the males, but she told how females haven't had as great a chance in the religious community," Julia Ziegler, freshman in open-option, said.

Marshall kept her speech to about 40 minutes to allow the audience to ask questions.

"I thought it was a very good lecture on how women are taking on a positive role in religion and leadership," Jonna Stricklan, freshman in elementary education, said.

Senate backs Republicans' $1 minimum-wage hike, business-tax breaks

BY CURT ANDERSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With eyes cast to the 2000 elections, the Senate voted Tuesday to give minimum-wage workers a dollar raise over three years — but tied the increase to $18.4 billion in business tax sweeteners opposed by the White House.

President Clinton immediately denounced the measure as a tool to advance special-interest tax breaks and renewed his promise to veto it. He urged Congress instead to pass a $1-an-hour increase over two years without the large tax cuts.

Veto threats notwithstanding, some Republicans viewed the package as a way to neutralize a Democratic political advantage on the minimum wage for 2000 races. Other Republicans were happy to vote for a new round of tax relief, an issue they want to resurrect following Clinton's veto in September of the GOP's signature $792 billion tax cut.

"This just seemed like the right combination as far as pulling Republicans together," Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., said. "Sooner or later, a very significant tax reduction for the American people is going to be achieved."

The vote was 54-44 for the Republican measure.

A few minutes earlier, the Senate had rejected, 50-48, a Democratic alternative raising the minimum wage by $1 over 13 months and providing $9.6 billion in tax relief. That measure also would have raised other taxes.

If the GOP bill becomes law, the current $5.15-an-hour minimum wage would rise by 35 cents in March 2000, by 35 cents more in March 2001 and 30 cents in March 2002. About 11 million workers would be affected directly, half of them workers under age 24 and many of them holders of part-time jobs.

The five-year tax package includes a health insurance deduction for people who don't have employer-provided coverage and an immediate 100-percent deduction for the self-employed. It also would increase the business meal deduction from 50 percent to 80 percent and allow higher 401(k) contribution limits.

Although the Ways and Means Committee in the House planned to take up a similar GOP minimum wage and tax package, it is unlikely that differences between the two can be ironed out before next year, if at all.

The Senate measure was attached to an unrelated bankruptcy bill that also would have to be approved.

But the political fight was at full tilt on both sides of the Capitol.

Senate Democrats sought to portray the Republican bill as a tax giveaway for well-off GOP business allies that would do little for workers who are struggling despite the booming U.S. economy.

"We are talking about men and women who are trying to do better," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass, said. "They are being given the back of their hand by the Republicans. Their proposal is a sham."

Republicans said the tax breaks would help absorb the cost to businesses of paying a higher minimum wage that they said could reduce the number of available low-wage jobs by as much as 500,000.

"We're talking about tax relief for small business, not the wealthiest," Sen. Rod Grams, R-Minn, said.

The tax cuts would be paid for out of projected non-Social Security surplus dollars in all but the first year.

Clinton repeatedly has said he will not accept the bill if it uses surplus dollars before other priorities are met. Republicans said the president wants to spend all of the money on government programs.

"The idea of spending the whole surplus probably won't hold up in the scrutiny of a political battle," Domenici said. "I frankly believe we win any way he chooses to do it."

Moderate Republican Sens. James Jeffords of Vermont, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Olympia Snowe of Maine joined all Democrats present in support of the Democratic plan, then voted for the GOP measure as well.

Chafee was sworn in just last week to replace his late father, John Chafee. All but Specter are up for re-election next year in states with strong labor constituencies.

On the Republican plan, Democratic Sen. Max Cleland of Georgia crossed party lines in favor while GOP Sen. George Voinovich of Ohio voted no.

Ten states and the District of Columbia already require minimum wages higher than $5.15 an hour, including a $6.50-an-hour wage paid in Oregon.

The other states are Alaska, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington.

Crew team loses meet to Kansas

By ERICA COURTRIGHT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It all came down to the final race.

The K-State women's rowing team completed its fall season with a loss to the University of Kansas over the weekend. The Cats fell to the Hawks in the Varsity 8 race, the final race of the afternoon, giving KU a17-9 victory in the 1999 Sunflower Showdown.

Three early K-State losses put KU on top 9-0.

In the Novice 4 race, K-State finished 36 seconds behind the Jayhawks with a time of 9:07.21, giving KU a 1-0 lead in the team standings. KU increased its lead to 6-0 in the Second Varsity 8+ race, as K-State's boat finished 11 seconds back, turning in a time of 7:09.07. The Second Novice 8 race yielded another KU victory as the Hawks edged the Cats by three seconds, increasing their lead to 9-0 in the team standings.

In the First Novice 8 race, the Cats battled back. K-State finished with a time of 7:14.80, nearly 18 seconds ahead of the Hawks, pulling the Cats within four points.

Head coach Jenny Hale was pleased with the performance, calling it one of the most well-rounded races she had ever seen.

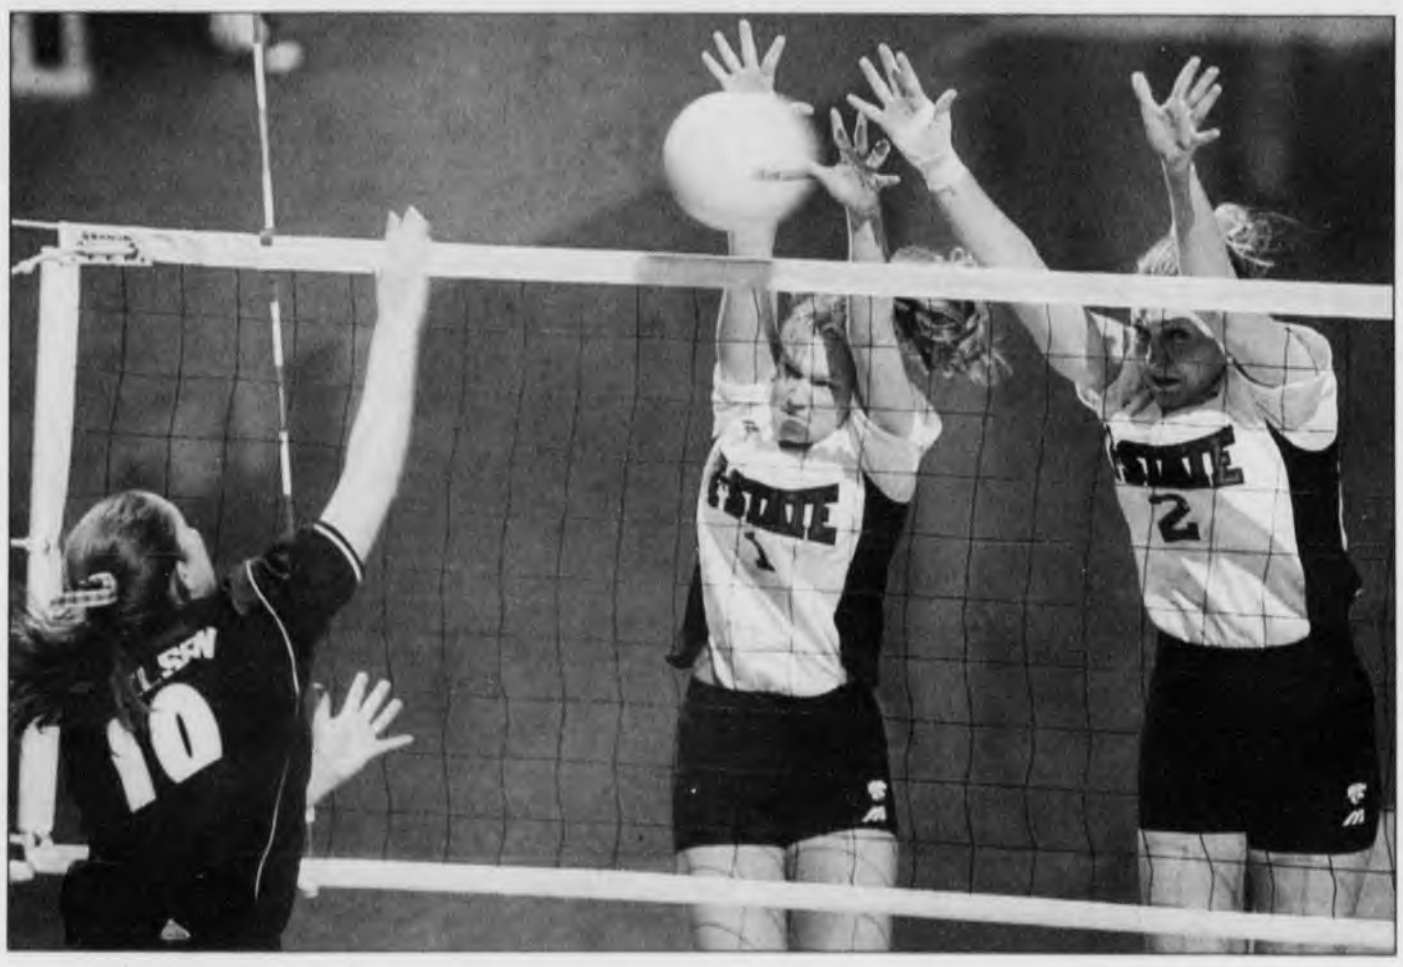
"The performance of our First Novice 8 was tremendous," Hale said. "It speaks of good things to come."

K-State continued chipping away at KU's lead with a victory in the Varsity 4 race. The Cats' time of 7:32.90, a few seconds ahead of the Hawks, cut KU's lead to one.

In the Third Novice 8, K-State tied things up with an eight-second victory in a time of 7:34.06.

With the team trophy on the line, K-State fell behind in the Varsity 8 race, the final race of the competition. In the last 1,000 meters, the Cats cut KU's lead down to a seat and a half, but eventually fell to the Hawks finishing just more than four seconds back in a time of 6:28.70.

"We just lost our rhythm a little in the last 1,500 meters," Hale said, "Otherwise, I think it would have been a real dog fight."



The Sunflower Showdown was K-State's last regatta of the fall season. The Cats have lost 10 seniors due to graduation, but Hale said the strong performance of the novice boats is promising.

"We took a pretty good hit in our depth," Hale said.

Hale said the team will be focusing on strength and conditioning over the next few months along with working on specific skills.

"With fitness comes a lot more confidence," Hale said.

The Cats return to action at the Indoor Championships in Lawrence in February.

HIGH STAKES

Volleyball team to chase title in game against Texas tonight

BY IVAN KOZAR

The No. 19 K-State volleyball team, after falling in four of its past five games, improved its record this past Saturday to 16-6, 10-4, after defeating the Iowa State Cyclones in three straight games 16-14,15-5 and 15-10.

The Wildcats swept the series with the Cyclones after previously cruising to a 15-2, 15-3, 15-6 win Sept. 29 in Ahearn Field House against the same team.

With the win, the Cats remain in the Big 12 Conference title chase as they are host to No. 12 Texas (16-5, 10-3) at 7 tonight in Ahearn.

The Cats barely escaped with a win in Austin, Texas, earlier in the season. It took four close games (22-20, 15-9, 11-15, 15-9) for the Cats to defeat the Longhorns for the first time in school history. The Longhorns lead the overall series 8-1.

The Cats are led by senior outside hitter Dawn Cady, who leads the Big 12 with an average of 5.44 kills per game and 4.12 digs per game.

Texas entered last week with sole possession of first place in the conference but lost to the No. 23 Baylor Bears in five games. With the loss, the University of Texas now is in a tie for first place with the No. 13 Nebraska Huskers.

Texas junior setter Jill Gremmel slowly is making her way to being the nation's best after racking up 146 total assists last week.

Gremmel is fourth in the nation in assists per game with 14.16 and has a Big 12 best 36 aces averaging 0.45 per game.

If the Cats lose to Texas, it will virtually eliminate its chances for a Big 12 title this season.

KC Royals' outfielder nabs award as top rookie

By RONALD BLUM
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Carlos Beltran of the Kansas City Royals was a nearly unanimous choice Tuesday as American League Rookie of the Year following a season in which he was the first rookie in 24 years with 100 RBIs and 100 runs.

The 22-year-old switch-hitting outfielder received 26 of 28 first-place votes. He also received one second-place vote and was bypassed on one ballot. He earned 133 points from a panel of the Baseball Writers' Association of American.

Seattle pitcher Freddy Garcia, 17-8 with a 4.07 ERA, was second with one first, 12 seconds and four thirds for 45 points, followed by Texas reliever Jeff Zimmerman with 27 points. Boston infielder Brian Daubach, who got the other first-place vote, was fourth with 16 points.

Beltran hit .293 with 22 homers, 108 RBIs, 112 runs and 27 steals in 35 attempts. He is the third Kansas City player to win the award, following Lou Piniella in 1969 and Bob Hamelin in 1994.

Beltran was the first rookie with 100 runs and 100 RBIs since Boston's Fred Lynn in 1975 and only the eighth overall, a group that includes Ted Williams and Joe DiMaggio.

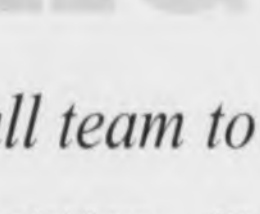
"He really looks like he can play," Twins manager Tom Kelly said early last season.

Beltran teamed with second baseman Carlos Febles to give the Royals what might have been the best rookie duo on one team since Lynn and Jim Rice in 1975.

"The scouts and the development people need to be given some credit," manager Tony Muser said. "It was their tutoring and their teaching and disciplining that got them so far so fast. I'm just going to try to continue what they've done, to keep them getting better and better and not getting complacent."

Muser said he thought he might have been rushing Beltran when he called him up from the minors in September 1998.

"I told him, 'Yeah, I'm ready to play. I think I'm ready,'" Beltran said.



Muser pointed to Beltran's number of at-bats this season.

"He's had tons of opportunities to play poorly, and he has not," Muser said. "He's done it in all facets — stealing bases, going first-to-third, improved his defense and has hit third in the lineup."

Cincinnati pitcher Scott Williamson was voted NL Rookie of the Year on Monday.

Baseball more diluted as players travel to richer teams

VIEWPOINT

CHRISTOPHER McLEMORE

Here we go again.

You definitely can see a pattern developing in Major League Baseball.

It goes something like this: Big-time player can't win championship. Big-time player becomes disgruntled with current team. Big-time player begs the New York Yankees to sign him. Big-time player goes to New York to win the World Series title that has eluded him, and walks off the field with a tear in his eye and that oh-so precious look on his face. And America becomes convinced that the big-time player was meant to be a champion, but he was held back by those meanies on his other team.

Then all the Yankees fans — who couldn't spell loyalty if you spotted them the all of the consonants — blow kisses to George Steinbrenner and throw themselves a parade so huge that half of the world's paper supply gets used as confetti and thrown from elitist penthouses onto the streets where the paper will never get picked up because the trash collectors in the Big Apple can't go one week without going on strike.

That's the way things are shaping up in baseball.

Yes, sirree, last year it was Roger "The Rocket" Clemens who got his get-out-of-jail-free card from the boys in pinstripes. He went to New York, had a mediocre season, got relegated to the fourth spot in the post-season rotation and had a World Series win handed to him. Congratulation, Rocket. You have avoided the Karl Malone "Yeah-he-was-good-but-he-never-won-the-big-one" syndrome. Now go get your ring finger sized.

This year, Ken Griffey Jr. has an eye on the Big Apple. His reasoning is simple. It's not that he doesn't like the Seattle fans who have treated him like King Midas since day one. Junior says he just wants to be on a team closer to his home, and I can't think of any place closer to his home in Orlando, Fla., than New York City. You know what they say: there's no place like 1,000 miles from home. Way to go, Junior. You fooled us all.

No one knows exactly for whom Junior wants to play, but when a marquee player is on the auction block, all the regulars are there to bid. The Braves and the Reds have been listed as possible candidates, but New York is the early favorite.

The result probably will be Junior joining an already great team and getting the Cliff's Notes version of a championship run.

Does anybody else remember when a major-league star could carry his team to post-season greatness?

Now you just have to sign on with the Yankees if you want to audition for the part of "Mr. October."

By the end of the off-season, Griffey will have a new team, and the Royals will be mathematically eliminated from the playoffs.

As Junior tosses around his options, the fans in Seattle who have put up with the dumbest mascot in sports and a terrible win-loss record are left with little to look forward to. Alex Rodriguez is a stellar shortstop, but A-Rod always has played Scottie Pippen to Griffey's Jordan.

What is Robin without Batman? Not much. And A-Rod already has hinted that the Mariners could offer him $500 million over three years and ownership of the space needle and he still would leave Seattle. If this happens, the Mariners will have lost Randy Johnson, Griffey and Rodriguez in a two-year period. Not since the Mayflower have we seen this type of mass exodus.

If Griffey were serious about being close to his family, he'd be suiting up with the Florida Marlins or the Tampa Bay Devil Rays, but Junior isn't just a family man. He's another title-seeker with 10 fingers ready for rings.

Don't get me wrong. I'm not saying that making the move from Seattle is all bad. But wouldn't it be more rewarding to put a team like the Mariners on your back and carry them to October greatness? Ken Griffey Jr. can call me from New York and let me know the answer.

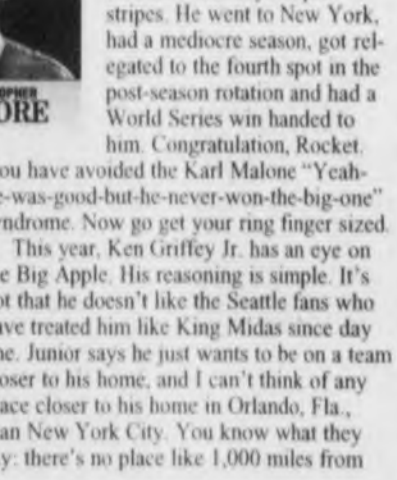
NOTES BY JOSHUA KINDER

Murphy's readiness unclear for matchup with Nebraska

Senior running back Frank Murphy's playing availability for the K-State Wildcats' matchup with the Nebraska Cornhuskers on Saturday still is uncertain.

Head coach Bill Snyder said Tuesday that Murphy practiced with the team Monday and that he intends to make the final decision just before kickoff.



MURPHY

"Frank practiced for just a little bit," Snyder said. "It'll go down exactly like it did this last week. I really didn't know whether we would or wouldn't play him until about 20 minutes before the ball game."

Against the Colorado Buffaloes, Murphy made his return to the field, rushing seven times for 3 yards. His return came after spending the previous four weeks sidelined with a high ankle sprain that he suffered against the No. 10 Texas Longhorns on Oct. 2 in Austin, Texas.

Murphy is second on the team in rushing with 453 yards on 72 carries. He has averaged 6.3 yards per carry, while scoring four touchdowns this year.

Snyder said junior Joe Hall is expected to start at running back.

NCAA Championship trophy to be shown at Cornhusker game

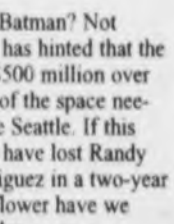
The Sears National Championship Trophy will be on display in Nebraska this weekend. The trophy has traveled throughout the nation to the top matchup each week.

In order for K-State to have a chance to play for the national title, it first must defeat Nebraska.

A win over the Huskers would guarantee K-State the Big 12 Conference North Division title for the second consecutive season and a place in the fourth-annual Big 12 Conference Championship game Dec. 4 in San Antonio.

Showdown features 2 of top-5 defenses

When the Cats and Huskers take the field Saturday, two of the nation's top defenses will be featured.



K-State's defensive trend in the 1990s has continued this year. They now sit at No. 2 in the country, while the Huskers are at No. 4.

Comprising the total defense is the Cats' top passing efficiency defense and their No. 12 rush defense. The Cats also lead the nation in turnover margin, with 29 takeaways compared to 15 giveaways.

As for the Huskers, they also are high on pass defense at No. 3 and barely lead K-State in scoring defense, holding opponents to 11 points per game, with Cats giving up 11.4 per contest.

K-State also has intercepted passes in 17 consecutive games dating back to last season, a school record. Senior Lamar Chapman leads the Cats in interceptions with five.

Fullback Lazetich's return questionable

LAZETICH

Junior fullback Johnno Lazetich suffered his second concussion of the season against Baylor two weeks ago, and sat out last week against the Buffs.

Tuesday, Snyder said Lazetich might be out for the season, but then again, it's still unsure at this time.

Lazetich has ran 10 times for 11 total yards on the year, while scoring his first career touchdown against Kansas on Oct. 9.

Three players are expected to be in the mix for the fullback position this week. Hall, who has seen significant time at the position, will contend depending on what happens at the running back position. Senior Ryan Payne and defensive end Monty Beisel also are expected to play against the Huskers.

Manhattan couple looks to open new coffeehouse

By KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Jim and Carol Buchheister are planning to open a new coffeehouse in Manhattan, but it won't be a typical business.

It will be a ministry, Carol Buchheister said.

"We want it to be a place to take friends who normally wouldn't step foot in church," she said.

The couple, who have been working with youth groups at the Westview Community Church for the past eight years, said this idea originated through listening to these youth groups and talking with their children.

"With our kids going to the high school here, we have seen a lot of kids that are nervous about church-sponsored activities," said Jim Buchheister, controller at the KSU Foundation. "There needs to be a different place that the Christian kids can hang out with their non-Christian friends without feeling threatened."

Jim Buchheister said everything for teen-agers to do in Manhattan is either one extreme or another — from a church-sponsored event to a party involving beer or drugs.

"There's nothing in between," he said.

The Buchheisters, though, had seen youth hanging out at coffeehouses in Aggieville and decided they wanted to aim for that type of atmosphere.

"It's something that struck us as being needed here — something we're supposed to do," he said.

Tim Dykes, executive director of Youth for Christ, said he agreed.

"There's been a lot of great need for something like this in the Manhattan community — a center where kids can hang out until curfew," Dykes said.

The Buchheisters said they want to attract high school students and provide weekend entertainment such as drama performances and bands. They said they also hope it will become an after-school hangout.

Carol Buchheister, Children's Bookstore assistant merchandiser, also said they want to display artwork from high school students like other Manhattan coffeehouses do.

The location they now are investigating is the old Manhattan Floral Co. building, 630 Poyntz Ave. They are looking into the zoning regulations of that location and talking with the owners about leasing the building.

"It appears to be the really good place to try it," Jim Buchheister said.

The coffeehouse will be run through a non-profit organization, Carol Buchheister said.

They said they are meeting with a lawyer and are looking at the guidelines to obtain non-profit status. One of the guidelines is a board of directors, which Carol Buchheister said might be made up of different people from the community along with some teen-agers.

"We have realized that it's not just going to happen with us," she said. "We know this is something that will take a great effort."

The Buchheisters also said they hope to incorporate college students into the business to provide positive role models for the high school students.

"We want to reach out to the college kids — use them as a resource," Jim Buchheister said.

Bob Anderson, director of Christian Challenge, said he thinks Manhattan is ripe for something like this and thinks incorporating college students is a good idea.

"I think college kids would enjoy it and warm up to it," he said.

Carol Buchheister said most of the initial funds probably will come from her husband and herself, but eventually they will start raising funds from sources like local churches and private or business donations.

However, right now they are concentrating on getting the word out about their project, she said.

They plan to print brochures about their project to circulate in the community and have approached several organizations like the Community Youth Council.

They also have thought of a name for the coffeehouse, The Carabiner, which is a safety hook used in rock climbing or on a rope course. Carol Buchheister said she and her husband have received many lectures on how important the carabiner is. She said it is considered a lifeline.

"It's vital — kind of like Christ is our lifeline," she said.

She said since they decided to do this, they have seen many articles on similar projects in other communities and have researched other operations like this.

Miranda Leathers, junior at Manhattan High School, had looked into a similar idea for Manhattan teen-agers and said she is excited about the Buchheister's idea.

"There is nothing really for high schoolers to do," she said.

The Buchheisters said they are looking optimistically at the first of the year as an opening date, but it's tough with both of them working.

Carol Buchheister said she was approached by one individual who questioned if this idea was adult-generated with no input from teen-agers.

"There are teens out there that are wanting a place," she said. "I would hope that they would take ownership of it."

Wildcat defensive end faces time in jail, fine for battery

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Cliff Holloman, a member of the K-State football team, waited two hours and 15 minutes Tuesday for his case to be heard. He then proceeded to plead no contest to charges of domestic battery.

Holloman was convicted on one count of domestic battery. Under the sentence, he will serve a brief jail sentence, City Prosecutor Christopher Getty said.

"He has to pay a $200 fine, and he was given a 30-day suspended sentence," Getty said. "Of that, he is required to serve 48 hours in jail."

Holloman will serve his time during the weekend of Dec. 4-6, a big weekend for K-State football fans — the Big 12 Championship game. K-State can clinch a place in the game by beating the University of Nebraska this weekend.

Getty said a decision on whether to move the time of the sentence would be up to the judge who sentenced Holloman.

Holloman also will undergo a domestic violence evaluation.

"He will have to attain a domestic evaluation from the Pawnee Mental Health Center," Getty said. "Then he will have to follow up on that."

The dispute to which Holloman pleaded no contest was an incident in which Holloman said he was trying to take the victim, his significant other, home. The two left a bar during an argument, and the court said the woman suffered injuries as a result of the dispute.

The victim in the case sat beside Holloman throughout the morning's court proceedings. She said she was a bit inebriated during the incident in question.

Getty said it would be wrong to speculate on why Holloman entered a plea of no contest.

"I don't know if I can comment on that," Getty said.

However, he said the incident was witnessed by people in the area.

"I will just say it was witnessed by quite a few people," Getty said.

Kent Brown, K-State Sports Information director, said the team had no comment at this time. He also said a statement to the news media from head coach Bill Snyder would be unlikely, and any disciplinary action would be handled internally.

Union construction leads to shortage of space, causes bookstore to branch out

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Throughout the renovation project at the K-State Student Union, students have had to deal with construction, noise and closed-off entryways. But perhaps the biggest move has been the relocation of the K-State Union Bookstore to the second floor.

With this move, merchandise has been limited because of space restrictions, and bookstore hours have been decreased. However, with two new satellite locations, students will have more of an opportunity to get the supplies they need.

Kathy Yates, merchandise division manager for the bookstore, said the main reason the two satellite locations were created was for convenience.

"The bookstore is now in a smaller space with decreased hours," Yates said. "We were looking for ways to provide for students when we were not open. This seemed like the logical step."

Yates said the two locations, Seaton Hall and Hale Library, were chosen because they were the best spots to serve students. She said the store in Seaton 21, next to the computer labs, has been open since Oct. 21 and has been getting great reviews.

"We know a lot of the students in Seaton spend many late hours working on projects in the building," Yates said. "The store is convenient for them, providing products they will need after the main bookstore has closed."

The store in Seaton mostly serves those students who are in architecture and engineering by selling merchandise such as balsa wood, bass wood, Exacto knives, engineering paper, technical pens and art bins.

Brian Bookwalter, student coordinator for the Seaton store and senior in graphic design and illustration, said right now, the store is ironing out a few problems with pricing and training, but said those who have used the location do not have any complaints.

"Not a whole lot of people know about the store because not a lot of advertising has been done," Bookwalter said. "I think the people that are in the building for studios find it convenient because they can stay in here to get their supplies instead of getting on their bike and going somewhere else."

Shawn Bergman, student coordinator for the Hale store and junior in biology, said by having the Seaton location opened prior to Hale, it has given him some time to hear what students like and do not like about the merchandise offered at Seaton.

"I like to hear suggestions from students because it helps me to know what to stock," Bergman said. "It's good to know what we can do for the people and how we can best serve the campus."

Yates said the second location offers more general merchandise such as filler paper, pens and pencils, notebooks and blue books.

"Students study at the library late," Yates said. "Sometimes they will need products to finish what they are working on, and the satellite bookstores will help them do this."

Bergman said the purpose of the store is to provide convenience for students and faulty who might need things after the main bookstore is closed.

"We are dedicated to providing service to students and the faculty," Bergman said. "Since the store will be open the same as the library, it will provide more time for students to get the things they need late at night."

Yates said the Hale location might become a permanent store after the bookstore returns to its original location in February.

The Seaton strore's future still is questionable, but for the time being, she said there has been a lot of positive feedback from students.

Bergman said Hale would be good as a permanent location because it is convenient for everyone to have a general supply store in the center of campus.

"If you can picture yourself studying late at night and can see the supplies you are using, that is the type of thing we will have at Hale," Bergman said. "All of the students need to come and give it at try at least once to see what they think of the new locations."

Father Keith Weber sits in his chair next to the altar at St. Isidore Catholic Student Center. Weber graduated from K-State with a degree in accounting, then decided to go to the seminary. He is in his 16th year of priesthood.

A Personal Closeness with GOD

Priest at Catholic student center works with students to find faith

BY KRISTEN DYMACEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Father Keith Weber might see himself as just a priest, but many students think of him as a mentor, an inspiration and a friend.

Weber, who is the priest at St. Isidore Catholic Student Center, grew up in Salina with three sisters and a brother. He graduated from K-State with a bachelor's degree in accounting.

"I worked as a CPA for a little while," Weber said. "I enjoyed it, but it wasn't completely fulfilling."

He said he participated in a lot of church activities after work.

The church provided Weber with such enjoyment and fulfillment that he decided the ministry was his calling.

After attending seminary in St. Louis, he has spent the last 16 years in parishes in Junction City, Salina and Manhattan.

Weber has worked with two Manhattan churches.

"I was at Seven Dolors (Catholic Church) for a few years, then I went to Salina," he said. "Then I came back here to St. Isidore's."

Weber said the St. Isidore's congregation offers a different setting than other parishes.

"There's a lot of enthusiasm and idealism here. I'm able to see a lot of growth of faith," he said.

Some of Weber's duties at St. Isidore's include leading mass several times a week, organizing retreats and counseling individuals and couples.

He teaches classes for people interested in becoming Catholic. He also serves on the K-State Committee on Religion and the Campus Ministers' Association.

"My basic goal as priest is to help other people come close to God. I not only focus on my own personal relationship with God, but also the faith relationship with the people I serve," he said.

Weber said he has faced a few challenges in his years in the priesthood.

"There's never been a time that I've had tremendous moments of doubt, but I have had moments when I've wondered if I can handle it," he said. "Especially when I start a new assignment or parish, and so much needs to be done, I wonder if I'm up for it.

"When that happens, I take a step back and remember I don't need to conquer it all in one day."

Some students said they appreciate Weber's type of sermons.

Stephanie Higgins, sophomore in business administrations and speech communications, said Weber applies his sermons to everyday life by talking about classes, football games and Aggieville night life.

"He always tells a joke, and it's usually about K-State and Nebraska or KU football," Higgins said. "I always look forward to the joke. He always ties it into the sermon."

Julie Sheerin, sophomore in family life and community services, said she agreed.

"Father Keith always brings the sermon down to the student level, one that we can relate to," Sheerin said. "He makes church fun."

Higgins said Weber is easy to talk to.

"His style isn't one to press you to be saved. It's more of inviting you to think about God and Catholicism," Higgins said.

"He's so much more approachable, because he's not giving you direct pressure."

Jeremy Heinen, senior in marketing and international business, said Weber has made a big difference in his life.

"Father Keith is one of the most influential people that I've met. He always give 110 percent to everything he does. He represents what Jesus is. He is one of the reasons I've chosen to go to seminary," Heinen said.

Sheerin said no matter how busy Weber is, he always make time for the students.

"He always has a big smile and hug for everyone," she said. "He's just an incredible example of how to live a Christian life."

Weber said he is happy with his job.

"I tremendously enjoy what I do," he said. "God has sure blessed me in many, many ways."

Center offers students services, picnics

BY KRISTEN DYMACEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At the St. Isidore Catholic Student Center, worship and praise, as well as picnics and parties, are offered to students who want to build a relationship with God and support each other in faith, Father Keith Weber said.

"The transition from their parents' faith to developing their own faith is an important time in students' lives," he said. "The student xenter helps students become closer to God."

Weber said about 2,100, or one in 10, K-State students attend St. Isidore's on a regular basis.

With a strong support system from others and a combination of worship and social activities, Weber said students are able to get a good perspective and a solid foundation in faith.

"The student center is an enjoyable place to come," he said. "The same people are here that you have class with, you eat with and you go to Aggieville with."

There are many activities to get involved with at St. Isidore's, said Julie Sheerin, sophomore in family studies and human services.

"There are peer coordinators that sponsor activities once every two weeks," Sheerin said.

"Some of the activities have been roller skating, ice skating and bowling."

She said there are Bible studies, scripture sharing similar to praise, worship and daily mass.

Weber said students also can get involved in community service activities like Christmas caroling, serving Thanksgiving dinner to the elderly and raking leaves.

St. Isidore's is a good place to escape on a busy or stressful day, Sheerin said.

"You can study or go watch TV," she said. "It's a good place to relax and forget about stress for awhile."

Sheerin said she always feels welcome at St. Isidore's.

"When I first went there, I didn't know anyone," Sheerin said. "Now, it's my home away from home. I can go there and get my fuel for the week."

Weber said anyone is invited to participate in any activities, even if they aren't Catholic.

"Everyone's welcome. We have a number of non-Catholic students come to mass," he said.

Roomates' sunflower-seed talks grow into weekend coffeehouse

BY SHANNON DELMEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On the corner of 17th and Humboldt streets sits a house different from all those around it. This is the place where a small dream became a large reality.

That dream was of a coffeehouse, a place where good coffee and live music flourished.

"When I was a freshman, I used to have a class with this guy," said Justin Williams, junior in family studies and human services. "Everyday we would chew sunflower seeds and talk about our dreams and stuff — what we always wanted to do. I always wanted to own a coffeehouse when I was a freshman. Finally, I got the idea to just have one. We basically just turned our house into a coffeehouse for a weekend.

"We sold real coffee drinks like cappuccino and stuff, and we had some mediocre live music," Williams said. "We had a lot of friends and local bands play at first."

That was only the beginning for Williams and his roommates, who reside in the house known as the Lighthouse, which is affiliated with the Christian group Ichthus and provides a place for college-aged Christians to live. From there, things kept getting bigger and better.

"After that, I was friends with a guy who was in a bigger band called Satellite Soul," Williams said.

"Somehow, we got them to come and do an acoustic set. It was crazy. There were like 200 people that came."

Williams and seven others who live in the Lighthouse have about two coffeehouse meetings a semester.

He said they like to see all types of music featured at the coffeehouses, but are trying to focus on Christian artists both locally and nationally.

Word about the coffeehouses is beginning to spread, Williams said.

"One thing that has been interesting this past year, instead of us pursuing them, there has been a lot of bands that have heard about us, and called us and sent us promo packs with their demo CDs and stuff," Williams said.

"It's really weird to have a band from South Carolina that has heard of our house. At the last coffeehouse, we had Andrew Peterson play, and a band from South Carolina, a national band called Silers Bald, played there," he said. "They heard about us and had never been to the Midwest, so they came and played for a night.

"When they first got there, we had the whole room cleaned out and a stage set up in our little living room, and they were like, 'Where are we playing at?' We were just sitting there saying, 'Uh, in here.' The looks on their faces was like, 'There is no way.' By the end of the night it was crazy. People were so packed in this room.

"I can see the next band coming and saying, 'Are you sure we can play here?,' and it's like, 'You just wait, buddy,'" Williams said.

Silers Bald even asked Williams and his roommates if they could come back to Manhattan and play again.

Others outside the Lighthouse have contributed to the recent coffeehouses. Bri Irwin, sophomore in family studies and human services, booked Andrew Peterson to play at the last coffeehouse.

"I thought it went great," Irwin said. "It was really great to see it all fall into place. It was awesome that the guys were willing to take responsibility for it and have it at the Lighthouse. It's a great place to hang out with people and listen to good music."

Irwin said the coffeehouses are different from other performances because they have a more intimate setting.

"The guys open up their apartments," she said.

"One of the apartments was where they were making coffee. One of them was open for a place to sit and not be right in the middle of everything. And Justin's apartment was actually where the band was playing. It's kind of neat, the way you can just move around and see the different people everywhere, as opposed to being in just one room."

The next coffeehouse meeting will be Nov. 19 at the Lighthouse. Diane Harrington, sophomore in Spanish, booked Eric Peters to play. Peters comes to Manhattan from Louisiana.

"Last year, Bri and I went on a road trip," Harrington said. "Eric Peters used to play with another guy, and their name was Ridgeley. We saw them at the concert we went to. I got on his Web site and found out his e-mail address and wrote, 'If you ever want to come to Manhattan, let us know.' So we just started e-mailing back and forth and ended up booking the show."

Williams, a musician himself, also will make an appearance at the next coffeehouse. He and Justin Hulsey, freshman in English, will open for Eric Peters.

Irwin said she enjoys the environment the music of the coffeehouse provides and would recommend it to anyone.

"If I was walking by and heard the music, I'd probably go and check it out," she said.

The combination of quick-witted players, random props and a spunky audience is all the troupe of Comedy Sportz needs to put on a hilarious show.

The four players, "Mr. Voice" and the referee composing the improvisational comedy squad did just that Tuesday at the K-State Student Union.

Comedy Sportz players Nikki DuPont, James Smith, Craig Hughes and Dan Walsh, along with referee Linda Williams and emcee Pete Calderone came from Kansas City, Mo., on Tuesday to perform a show, sponsored by Union Program Council.

"We have had them come in the past, and they have been a success," said Matt Scheck, senior in mass communications and chairman of the UPC Eclectic Entertainment Committee. "What they do is totally improvisational, and they ask for interaction with the audience, which makes the show a lot of fun."

The players of Comedy Sportz perform a show in which the players split into two teams that compete against each other for the most points.

They involve the audience in their improvisational comedy and end up making fools of themselves, and the audience, at times.

"It is a lot like the TV show 'Whose Line Is It Anyway'," Scheck said.

Comedy Sportz has been to K-State previously and travels around different parts of Kansas to perform for various groups and functions.

Williams said everything they do is different each show.

"With the audience interaction, it is proof that we are making everything up off the tops of our heads," Williams said.

The show consists of several "games" that the two teams compete against each other in. The games vary from random pantomime games to games where a constant rhyme has to be kept going by the players.

"My favorite game is the rhyming game where we have to keep the song going with different random names," Hughes said. "That can get interesting."

For the audience, the interaction with the players can be funny but strange at the same time.

"I have never seen them before," Brianna Hooks, freshman in business, said. "I thought they were very oddball, but creative."

The players of Comedy Sportz look to create a vibrant response from the audience and usually succeed in doing so.

"The last game that they did was my favorite," Jacqueé Jones, freshman in secondary education, said. "I was shocked at the things they said when they were supposed to come up with the worst things to say at a funeral."

The players of Comedy Sportz said they made the evening fun for themselves and for the audience while proving that they are not an average comedy troupe.

"I like to get the audience involved," Walsh said. "The Five Things' game is the most fun for me to get the audience involved."

Commission recommends upgrade of local street to freeway standards

By TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Seth Child Road could become part of the city's jurisdiction in a plan that would increase the possibility for state-funded repairs to Fort Riley Boulevard.

City commissioners made recommendations for an application to the Kansas Department of Transportation for Kansas Highway 18 improvements at a policy session meeting Tuesday. The proposed project would upgrade Fort Riley Boulevard from Westwood Road to Ogden, Kan., to freeway design standards, which would include reconstruction of much of the roadway.

> "It's a very large issue and it's a very complicated issue, and unfortunately, it's on a very small time frame."
> — Jerry Petty, Manhattan director of public works

The city of Manhattan's application to the Kansas Department of Transportation can be enhanced by accepting maintenance responsibilities of Seth Child Road from the state.

The road now is designated a Kansas highway, leaving the state to pay for maintenance work. Pending approval from the City Commission and acceptance from KDOT, the highway's designation as a state highway could be dropped, leaving Seth Child as an arterial road through the city.

Jerry Petty, Manhattan director of public works, said the improvements would not begin before 2004, and could begin at late as 2009, depending on KDOT scheduling of the improvements with other state projects. The application for the state funds is due by Dec. 8.

"It's a very large issue and it's a very complicated issue, and unfortunately, it's on a very small time frame," Petty said.

The project is part of the Comprehensive Transportation Plan passed by the 1999 Kansas Legislature, which earmarks $1.05 billion in state funds for the program.

Although KDOT must accept the city's application for Fort Riley Boulevard improvements, Petty said other area highway projects would complement the upgrade.

Kansas Highway 18 will become a four-lane highway from Interstate 70 to Ogden, and improvements will be made at the intersection of Fort Riley and Seth Child.

The KDOT-administered projects will be completed regardless of KDOT's acceptance of the city's application for Fort Riley improvements.

City commissioners also heard recommendations from a five-member board of long-time Manhattan residents concerning needed changes in the city. The board developed ideas for improvements in eight sectors of the community: animal care, child care, economic development, growth, historic preservation, medical care, transportation, and parks and recreation.

"All eight of these issues represent a piece of Manhattan, and a piece of that picture we want to maintain," Helen Cooper, board chairwoman, said.

Board member Richard Seddler said Manhattan residents should come together to set community priorities for important issues affecting the city.

"It clearly is time to take a look at the future of our community with all of our citizens," he said.

Flight data recorder from EgyptAir crash found

By PAT MILTON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEWPORT, R.I. — Nine days after EgyptAir Flight 990 went down, the banged-up flight data recorder — minus its pinger — was raised from the ocean floor by a robot Tuesday and rushed to Washington, D.C., for analysis.

The National Transportation Safety Board said it was extracting data from the recorder Tuesday evening but had no comment on the quality of the data recovered so far.

"The magnetic tape was removed from its protective casing, cleaned and dried," NTSB chairman James Hall said in a statement. "The tape has data on it, and NTSB engineers are currently working to extract information."

The NTSB was hoping to reveal partial findings from the recorder today.

The minivan-size robot Deep Drone stumbled across the dented box amid wreckage 250 feet below the surface. It was missing its pinger, the small, cylindrical transmitter that emits a signal to help investigators find the recorder after an accident.

The tape could provide the best evidence of what caused the Boeing 767 to plunge into the sea Oct. 31 off the Massachusetts island of Nantucket, killing all 217 people aboard.

"It will paint a picture of the aircraft moments before the accident," Hall said earlier in the day. "In any aviation accident investigation, the most important information comes from the recorders."

The flight recorder, which is 20 inches long, 5 inches wide and 6 inches high, captures information from 55 systems on the jet, telling investigators such things as the plane's altitude, speed, spin, roll, when electrical power was cut off and how the autopilot functioned. The NTSB said it can record more than 150 individual data items.

Deep Drone continued to search for the other black box, the cockpit voice recorder, which contains tape of conversations between crew members as well as discussions with air traffic controllers and any other sounds in the cockpit.

The Magnum, another underwater robot, was back in the water by late Tuesday, resuming its search for the second black box.

As the search continued, a Coast Guard helicopter flew over the crash site and dropped flowers that had been left at a memorial service Sunday by grieving family members.

Flight 990 took off from New York's Kennedy Airport for Cairo and fell 33,000 feet into the Atlantic about 60 miles south of Nantucket. No distress call went out from the crew. Investigators are looking into all possibilities, including mechanical failure, human error and sabotage.

Deep Drone, a veteran of earlier plane disaster recoveries, came across the flight data recorder about 5 a.m. and hauled it to the deck of the USS Grapple.

Hyde's lecture rescheduled for December after delay

Students looking to hear views and beliefs from Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., will have to wait a few weeks.

Hyde's Landon Lecture has been rescheduled for 10:30 a.m. Dec. 1 in McCain Auditorium.

"Congress is still in session, and Congressman Hyde did not want to leave before all the major legislation was finished," said Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series.

Hyde's speech was supposed to be given Nov. 5, three days before the Landon Lecture presented by ABC news commentator Cokie Roberts.

Hyde will follow a long line of speakers, ranging from news commentators to presidential candidates, in the Landon Lecture Series.

He will bring his own flavor of U.S. politics to the podium. He has represented the 6th district of Illinois since 1974, and he has chaired the House Judiciary Committee since 1994. He also serves on the Subcommittee on the Constitution and the Subcommittee on International Operations and Human Rights.

— Nick Bratkovic

Biology professor to give speech Thursday afternoon

The mechanisms of coexistence in terrestrial plant communities will be explained by Heather Reynolds, assistant professor of biology at Kalamazoo College and adjunct professor at Michigan State University's Kellogg Biological Station, at 4 p.m. Thursday in Ackert 221.

Reynolds will present evidence promoting coexistence and species diversity in terrestrial plant communities, specifically annual California grassland species and Michigan old-field perennials. She also will introduce research testing the relationship of light and soil nutrient heterogeneity to patterns of plant species diversity across broad productivity gradients of temperate plant communities.

Former journalist visits K-State, offers reflections on career

BY SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The last thing David Awbrey wanted to do was follow in his father's footsteps and become a journalist.

In fact, throughout his time as a student at the University of Kansas in the late 1960s, Awbrey was set on practicing law. That was until a friend arranged for him to see firsthand what lawyers do.

"It was really awful," he said. "They sit around and research cases. It's not 'Perry Mason.' It's not 'L.A. Law.' It's not fun."

So, Awbrey decided to take up his father's trade. He began his career as a journalist in 1972 in Burlington, Iowa. He was hired by an editor who knew his father.

"I got my job the old-fashioned way — through nepotism," he said.

Awbrey was on campus Tuesday to speak to journalism students about the changing face of the industry and the continuing importance of journalism in a global society.

Jennifer Hotchkiss, senior in agricultural journalism, said she was impressed by Awbrey's openness.

"He was very conversational," she said. "He spoke at our level. You felt like you could trust him."

Using examples from his own life and hardships, Awbrey portrayed the difficulties and positive qualities of the field.

He said he experienced the rise to success in his 20s and 30s but paid the price for it later in life.

While in his mid-20s, Awbrey was traveling the world as a well-respected journalist. In 1976, he covered the presidential primaries and general election.

It was difficult not to let some of the power go to his head, Awbrey said.

"When you're a journalist, you're in control," he said. "There's a great deal of power involved. You can demand information from people, and they are accountable to you because it will be printed.

"If you learn about power at a young age, you can learn how to handle it," he said.

At age 43, Awbrey hit the pinnacle of his career when he returned to Kansas and became editor of The Wichita Eagle's editorial page. It had always been his goal to become the opinion editor of a metropolitan newspaper. Once Awbrey had everything he wanted, he had time to step back and look at his life.

He didn't like what he saw.

"I fell into a deep life depression, basically because I had achieved everything I wanted," he said. "It was a case of having it all. I had to rethink a lot of issues."

Awbrey moved back to Lawrence, where he battled depression. Recapturing a sense of community and spirituality eventually led him out of the depression.

"I got the sense that I wasn't alone anymore," he said.

"Community and spirituality — evolve your life around those two things," he said.

Being in Kansas was another important force that pulled Awbrey out of his depression.

"I call myself a Dorothy," he said. "I went to Oz and came back to Kansas.

"If you leave Kansas and come back, you're going to feel a connection."

Awbrey said this is because of the size of the state.

"It's small enough that you can make a difference, but big enough that it still matters," he said.

After battling depression, Awbrey wrote a book, "Finding Hope in the Age of Melancholy," which was based on his struggle and the cultural and social roots of depression.

In a review of his book, Gail Hudson writes, "What makes this book so impressive are Awbrey's honest self-revelations (including his own descent into depression, his back-stabbing ambitions and his ultimate 'free-will commitment to God'), which play against his outstanding research on the history and spiritual teachings on melancholy."

Although Awbrey has no plans to return to corporate journalism, he said he never will regret any of the time he spent working in the profession.

"Journalists find the stories," he said. "What more could you ask for? The pen is mightier than the sword.

"You're shaping history," he said.

Awbrey said the most important part of a journalist's job is to tell people's stories.

"You are a tribune to the powerless," he said. "No one else will get these people's stories out."

Hotchkiss said Awbrey made it clear that there were no regrets with the journalism profession.

"He told us no one he knows has ever regretted being a journalist," she said. "They may move on to other things, but they'll never regret the time they spend doing this.

"I think it's because there's always something to take away from it," she said.

"The faculty had hoped that salaries would be raised to at least the average of peer institutions," Gray said. "My guess is faculty salaries will not increase."

Rawson said the multi-year budget request for faculty raises was approved by the Board of Regents and was supposed to be presented to legislators June 30. This plan calls for an 8.5-percent increase in wages during the next fiscal year.

"It's a step towards getting salaries on the same level as the average of peer institutions," Rawson said. "The 8.5 percent is assuming that the others will raise salaries."

BONE MARROW

The drive is a way to find matches for patients in need of bone marrow. People suffering from leukemia, aplastic anemia and other blood-related diseases can be cured only by a bone-marrow transplant, Frieling said..

Lux explained the donation process, which takes about 20-25 minutes.

"Bone-marrow donors sit through a 10-minute video prior to donation," Lux said. "The video explains the process and the importance of donating bone marrow. A prospective donor must then read some set guidelines and fill out a short application to make sure that the person meets the criteria.

"The eligibility guidelines are that the donor be from 18 to 59 years of age, be in good health, have no chronic diseases and be in accordance with a height and weight chart."

A vial of blood is drawn during the donation, which is sent to the national registry and put into a computer.

Lux said there are three stages potential donors must go through becoming actual bone marrow donors. The first stage is the actual blood donation. The donor then has a 1-in-10,000 chance of being a match to a person in need of bone marrow. The donor only has a 1-in-10 chance of being a perfect match in the final stage, however.

"Unfortunately, by that point, the patient in need of the transplant may be too sick or may have died," Lux said. "A lot of factors go into finding an exact match."

Frieling said if a donor who becomes an exact match is willing to donate bone marrow, there are two different processes that can be used to extract the marrow.

Frieling said the first process is the regular way, in which the person goes under anesthesia and a needle is used to go into the hip bone and retrieve the marrow. The donor usually remains in the hospital for a day or so and is a bit sore.

The second method, which is new, is similar to a plasma donation and involves a needle placed in the veins of both arms. One needle extracts the blood, and the marrow is filtered out. Then the blood is returned to the body through the needle in the other arm. This process takes four to five hours, and the donor is fully awake. After the process is over, the donor is sore and needs to rest.

"As of September 19, 3,700,000 people are part of the registry, and of those, there have been only 9,000 transplants," Frieling said.

Frieling said she encourages people to donate because it helps save lives.

"Each year thousands of people die from diseases such as leukemia and other blood-related diseases that can be cured only with a bone-marrow transplant." she said. "Oftentimes, those people don't have a matched family member who can donate the needed marrow."

Julie Flint, senior in biology, said she went through the donation process about three years ago. She said people need to go into the donation knowing that it's a lifetime commitment, and they need to be prepared for the possibility that they might become someone's only chance of survival.

"The prospect of saving someone's life is hanging in the balance," Flint said. "For the few seconds it took, you could be giving someone else a chance at health and happiness. It was a small thing to do for a potentially huge result."

E-MAILS

Other lines with more graphic sexual suggestions were written in the e-mail.

"I would have been freaked out, without her saying anything," Maximuk said. "It's weird. I don't know how he picked me."

Maximuk said she thought because Drake was in her sorority house and had also received the e-mail, that their addresses had been obtained through a listserv.

"Nobody else got it except us two," she said. "There's nothing besides the house that connects us. We're not from the same hometown or hang out together."

Drake said she initially was concerned about what action to take.

"I felt really paranoid since it was directed to me and kind of disturbed about what to do," she said. "The computer head of our house told us to contact Yahoo and K-State computing services."

Both Maximuk and Drake said Yahoo.com confirmed it received their concerns.

Harvard Townsend, director of Computing and Network Services, said Yahoo typically protects its customers' identities.

"The trick is often identifying the individual. This individual used a Yahoo account and signed himself as Matt. There's no way to tell who the real Matt is," Townsend said. "Yahoo won't reveal the privacy of their customers."

This type of harassment falls under the harassment-by-telephone penalty, Lane said. A class A misdemeanor could be charged to "Matt."

"It's about the highest misdemeanor you could get before it turns into a felony," he said.

Townsend said he hoped this case could be tried as a criminal case so it could serve as an example to stop similar events from occurring.

He offered advice to victims of undesired e-mails.

"Don't reply or engage them in any kind of dialogue. They're trying to entice people into a relationship. If you receive unsolicited, unwanted, offensive messages, don't delete it and don't reply," he said.

He said a person would be playing into the sender's hands if a response is made.

"It's best just to report it and don't respond," Townsend said.

He also stressed the importance of saving the message. He said it could provide useful information on the header.

"That's real important, not to delete it," he said.

Maximuk and Drake made the appropriate contacts but still have concerns.

"I don't see why anybody would do this. I wonder if anyone replied and said, 'Yeah, come on over.' I just don't see the point," Maximuk said.

DOG

was taken or even whether it was stolen at all, he said he suspects he knows why someone might want it.

"It might have been stolen to be a hunting dog," Bullock said. "I've heard of that happening before."

A native of Tennessee, Bullock was just passing through Manhattan. He stopped to watch the K-State football game and visited Tuttle Creek Reservoir the next day.

Prior to arriving in Manhattan, Bullock hit a deer and had to fix about $200 of damage to his van. As a result, he now is running out of money and is forced to sleep in his van in the Wal-Mart parking lot. Bullock said he cannot leave until he finds Jet.

"I'm not leaving until I get my dog," Bullock said. "I've had him ever since he was a pup, and I fell in love with him. He's the only family I've got. They can steal my car, steal my radio, but don't steal flesh and blood."

Bullock said he has contacted the animal shelter and the Riley County Police Department, and that anyone who finds the dog should contact one of those two organizations.

Kansan charged with murder

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OSKALOOSA, Kan. — A first-degree murder charge was filed Tuesday in the death of a 14-year-old girl who disappeared after being let off a school bus at her home last week.

The Jefferson County attorney charged Thomas Bledsoe in the death of Zetta Camilla Arfmann. He was being kept at the Jefferson County Jail.

Bledsoe, 25, of Oskaloosa, reportedly is the brother of Arfmann's brother-in-law. Vanderbilt declined to comment on the relationship or on other details of the case.

Arfmann, of rural Oskaloosa, was last seen Friday afternoon at 4:20 p.m. after she was let off the bus outside her family's mobile home. Her body was discovered about 2:30 a.m. Monday in a ditch three miles northwest of Oskaloosa, covered with dirt and trash. Sheriff's officers went there in response to a tip, said Jefferson County Sheriff Roy Dunnaway.

An autopsy showed she had been killed by a firearm, Dunnaway said.

Dunnaway said Arfmann, who was called Camille, was not at the home about 1.25 miles east of Oskaloosa when a visitor arrived there about 5 p.m.

KSDB privilege fee request postponed until next week

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Privilege Fee Committee wants to make the right decision.

So it decided to wait until next week to make any motions concerning KSDB-FM 91.9's request for a $13,054 increase in fees.

If granted, it is undetermined whether the request would increase student fees, committee chair Ryan Walker said.

The station's current budget is $42,676 for operating expenses and a station manager's salary.

The request follows last year's budget increases and station audit, which revealed large discrepancies in the way funds were used at the station.

The audit showed the station needed changes in overall management of operations, depositing all university receipts into a university account, time and leave reporting and personal phone-call policies.

Last week, the station also introduced an outline of equipment costs for a move to the K-State Student Union. The equipment would cost $38,005, not including remodeling the space, and the costs of labor, furniture or soundproofing.The requests are not being considered at this time.

"I think we need to concentrate on the budget and wait on the Union project. I think it confused some people last time," said Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

This year the station has completed its first actual budget and hopes to create a consistent budget for equipment and other station expenses, Simon said.

"We're different from other entities because we've got nothing but very broad projections," he said.

"We are estimating that there will be a big gap between the money it would take to run this place and the money we're getting.

"I'd like to see an increase in underwriting, but we've never had a consistent history in that area," Simon said.

Committee member Lance Stafford said the station is at a disadvantage because this is one of its first budgets.

"It's always helpful to compare," he said. "If you can't compare it to the past, it is more difficult to predict what they will need."

Committee member Kris Meiergerd said he sees next week's vote as setting an important precedent for the future.

"I think it's good we're waiting," he said. "It is always important to see how it affects students. If it's worth it and if the students need this. Would it be worth paying for? We need to really look and decide if it is worth the money."

Germans celebrate 10-year anniversary of fall of Berlin Wall

By COLLEEN BARRY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BERLIN — With fireworks, concerts and a huge party at the landmark Brandenburg Gate, Germany celebrated on Tuesday the courage of hundreds of thousands of East Germans who brought down the reviled Berlin Wall 10 years ago with their peaceful demands for democracy.

Daylong observances — starting with religious services and official ceremonies — sought to inspire a sense of shared national identity and remind Germans that the Wall's collapse alone did not guarantee the bloodless transition from communism to democracy that originated in East Germany and spread eastward.

"We should look at German unity as a gift and a chance for the future," former Chancellor Helmut Kohl told lawmakers and invited guests at the German parliament, including former President Bush and former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

Reuniting a decade after the Cold War ended peacefully, the former world leaders reflected on how it might have been otherwise had they not developed a personal trust, allowing each to pursue a course that redrew the map of Europe and created a new world order.

The rest of the world might have been celebrating communism's imminent demise on Nov. 9, 1989, but the leaders recalled their fears that communist hard-liners might order a crackdown. Bush and Kohl expressed particular gratitude toward Gorbachev, who kept Soviet soldiers in their East German barracks in the crucial hours after the Wall tumbled and then helped negotiate German unity a mere 11 months later.

Bush recalled pressure from U.S. lawmakers to travel to Berlin and dance on the Wall with students, claiming Western victory in the Cold War.

"I knew this was not the time to gloat over what many in the West would call a defeat for Russia," Bush said. "The reason the superpower struggle ended without literally a shot being fired, was in large measure, because the leaders on the scene knew one another."

Despite the euphoria now associated with Nov. 9, it is not a national holiday largely because it coincides with the anniversary of Kristallnacht — the Night of Broken Glass — when Nazi storm troopers destroyed Jewish businesses and synagogues 61 years ago, presaging the Holocaust.

That dark side of Germany's history was remembered in speeches by Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and others in parliament.

Kristallnacht "stands for our eternal shame and the unforgettable dishonor that the Nazis and their supporters brought upon Germany and the world," Schroeder said.

Two former eastern dissidents — parliament president Wolfgang Thierse and Joachim Gauck, administrator of the former Stasi secret police files — honored as "heroes" ordinary East Germans who exerted popular pressure that toppled the Wall — and spoke of the extraordinarily difficult transition of the last decade.

"After unification we felt like apprentices again. Many felt like strangers in their own country," Gauck said.

Germany has struggled to overcome enduring psychological differences 10 years after the most tangible symbol of Europe's division was dismantled by the hammers of easterners breaking free of political oppression and westerners who bade them welcome.

A party in the former no man's land that once marked the Cold War fault line set out to recreate that mood of exultation, and bring Germans together to celebrate their achievements.

Despite typically rainy weather, up to 50,000 revelers showed up to hear musicians play on five stages along the Wall's former path from the Brandenburg Gate to the former American-run border crossing at Check Point Charlie. Cellist Mstislav Rostropovich gave an encore of his spontaneous 1989 performance at the Wall.

Events climaxed with the illumination of a 2 1/2-mile path once followed by the Wall with sparkling flares, ending with fireworks behind the Brandenburg Gate, a symbol of Europe's division that was incorporated into the Berlin Wall during the three decades it divided the city. Lead singer of the German rock band Scorpions, Klaus Meine, sang the celebration's anthem, "Wind of Change," accompanied by 167 cellists.

There also were further reminders Tuesday of measurable differences that remain between eastern and western Germany. The latest unemployment data showed improvement in the west, to 8.2 percent in October, while the rate in the formerly communist, still-struggling east worsened to 16.9 percent.

Opposition lawmakers seized on the figures to question the government's commitment to improving the living standards of easterners.

Finalists identified for RCPD

■ Candidates to begin interviews this weekend in race for position as director of city/county police.

By TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

The six finalists for the Riley County Police Department director's position include Wichita Police Chief Mike Watson and two RCPD captains, officials said Wednesday.

The full list includes RCPD Capts. Steve French and Dana Kyle, as well as three other candidates: a Kansas City, Kan., police supervisor; a retired Michigan police chief and a Tennessee sheriff who lost his 1998 bid for reelection.

The finalists were announced Wednesday morning — two days before they're set to arrive in Manhattan. The Riley County Law Board will choose a new director this weekend, board chair Bruce Snead said, but the name won't be announced until contract negotiations are complete.

Current RCPD Director Al Johnson, who has led the department for more than 20 years, plans to retire Dec. 31.

The law board, which includes city and county commissioners, will interview candidates Friday and Saturday. The six men also will speak at public forums for police officers, citizens and the media.

Board members want to choose an experienced director, Snead said, but that doesn't mean internal candidates have an advantage.

"Experience in all aspects will be important, whether it's here in Riley County or wherever they have spent their careers," Snead said.

Whoever is picked will be faced with an immediate task: moving the department into a new law enforcement center expected to be completed in April. The RCPD director leads the state's only consolidated city/county police department, with 88 officers and a $7.8 million budget.

Snead and other law board members were careful on Wednesday to avoid praising individual candidates, but Watson's name on the finalist

No proof found of faulty parts in plane crash

■ EgyptAir flight seemed normal until autopilot failed, data shows.

By GLEN JOHNSON
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The first sign of abnormality aboard EgyptAir Flight 990 came when the autopilot disconnected not long after the plane began what should have been a long period of cruise flight, the National Transportation Safety Board said Wednesday.

NTSB Chairman Jim Hall, giving the first bits of information from the plane's flight data recorder, said eight seconds after the autopilot disconnected, the New York-to-Cairo flight began what appeared to be a controlled descent from 33,000 feet to about 19,000 feet.

The recorder stopped shortly afterward, and the final five to 10 seconds of information on its tape still are being analyzed by safety board technicians, Hall said.

He dashed speculation that the plane's initial plunge was caused by a problem with a thrust reverser — the cause of a 1991 crash of another Boeing 767 in Thailand.

Thrust reversers are used to slow an airplane upon touchdown with the runway. One of EgyptAir's reversers was out of service at the time of the Oct. 31 crash.

"There is no evidence of thrust reverser deployment in the data we have," Hall said.

The tape could provide the best evidence yet into what doomed the jet.

Flight 990 took off early Halloween morning from New York's Kennedy International Airport, rising to 33,000 feet before plunging into the sea south of Nantucket Island, Mass., about 40 minutes after takeoff. All 217 people aboard were killed.

Investigators have not ruled out any possible cause, including mechanical failure, human error, sabotage and terrorism.

K-State examines use of fees

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

A U.S. Supreme Court case involving the University of Wisconsin could force K-State to change the way it allocates student fees.

The case stems from a lawsuit that several Wisconsin students filed in objection to the use of their student fees for liberal campus groups to which they were ideologically opposed. Those groups include the International Socialist Organization; Campus Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Center; and an AIDS support network. Wisconsin argues that public universities and colleges should be able to use mandatory student fees to finance a variety of campus groups, even those with unpopular views.

Jaimie Hartter, junior in mass communications, said she agreed.

"It doesn't matter to me," Hartter said about her money going to controversial groups. "That money is there to help people."

Helping to pay for other students' activities, however, bothers Elliott Clark, senior in biology.

"It doesn't seem like it would be fair unless I was in one of those groups," Clark said. "I don't want my money to be wasted on stuff that I don't have anything to do with."

A federal trials judge and a federal appeals court already have ruled in favor of the Wisconsin students. Their decisions were based primarily on a 1995 Supreme Court decision that barred public universities and colleges from creating a public forum for students, then refusing to subsidize some groups because of their viewpoints.

The Supreme Court heard the case Tuesday and will decide whether universities can use student fees to subsidize student groups that pursue a political agenda. A decision in favor of the students potentially could change the way all universities, including Wisconsin and K-State, disperse student fees. The changes required of K-State, however, likely would be less drastic than at other universities, Jake Worcester, Student Senate chair, said.

"I'm pretty confident we are probably OK," Worcester said. "Our regulations are pretty stringent. We allocate money to religious organizations for activities. However, there has to be an educational purpose to it."

Carlton Getz, Senate Allocations Committee chair, said he agrees.

"The process Wisconsin uses to allocate student fees doesn't have the same kind of Manhattan High School West Campus sophomore Tina Tyre comforts a great horned owl with sweet-talking and a smile Friday afternoon at Sunset Zoological Park as she cleans its pen. Tyre works as a zookeeper's assistant twice a week in the after-school program, Zoo Crew.

Life on the Zoo crew

STORY BY LAUREN BEATTY

"The students learn everything like animal-keeping skills, diet and husbandry, and team building."

— Schanee Anderson, curator of education at Sunset Zoological Park

Teen-agers in Manhattan are getting a chance to experience the work of an animal-care professional at Sunset Zoological Park this fall.

Zoo Crew is a volunteer program designed for 13- to 18-year-olds interested in animals and zoology. The program began in January at the zoo. This is the fourth session, and it will end in mid-December.

Schanee Anderson, curator of education at Sunset Zoo, said the program is a great way for teen-agers to learn all aspects of animal care.

"The students learn everything like animal-keeping skills, diet and husbandry and team building. They also re-design animal exhibitry," Anderson said.

Fifteen students volunteer twice a week during this session. The zoo offers transportation to the zoo after the teenagers get done with school and back home when their work is done, usually around 5:30 p.m.

While they are at the zoo, the volunteers work with the educational animals such as invertebrates, amphibians, reptiles, small mammals and the educational birds.

Instructors Katie O'Connor and Lisa Riecker divide the kids into two groups each day. One group works with the invertebrates and the other group works with the birds.

Riecker, a volunteer-turned-instructor, said each day she cleans and feeds all the invertebrate animals.

The educational animals also travel to schools and organizations. Riecker said that when the volunteers are working with the animals, each task must be completed exactly right, and the volunteers must be clean and neat.

Any germs can hurt the invertebrates. Riecker said even the way the animals' food is cut is important.

O'Connor works with the birds. The zoo has four birds, including owls and hawks.

The educational birds are those that cannot survive in the wild on their own.

O'Connor said the kids usually will work on cleaning the bird cages, but she likes to add extra things in their lessons.

"I'll teach them the biological aspects of the animals, and the next day they'll be able to recite it back to me," O'Connor said. "This is really like a biology lab. This is the best lab they could have."

Fifteen-year-old Tina Tyre, a student at Manhattan High School West Campus, said she really enjoys her work at the zoo because she is interested in becoming a marine biologist in the future.

"I thought it would help me get into the college I want and the career choice I want. I actually want to get a job at the zoo later," Tyre said.

"Most students really enjoy the work. Occasionally there are students who don't enjoy the work, but that's good too because they learn that this isn't what they want to be," Anderson said.

Anderson also said it's a good program because it is real.

"They learn that zookeeping is a tough job. It's dirty and it takes a lot of dedication," Anderson said.

Anderson said it shows students there are other ways to work with animals besides being a veterinarian.

Education budget appears bleak for upcoming 2 years

TOPEKA — Education officials and Gov. Bill Graves' administration are more than $100 million apart on what they think the state should spend on education in the coming months.

Deputy Education Commissioner Dale Dennis painted a bleak budget picture for the State Board of Education on Wednesday. He said the Division of Budget is recommending an $18.9 million cut from the $2.26 billion education budget for the current fiscal year, which began July 1.

That reduction is based on a 1 percent cut in current spending that Graves has recommended for all state agencies because state revenues aren't living up to original projections.

For fiscal 2001, which begins July 1, 2000, the Division of Budget recommends $87.5 million less in spending than the $2.35 billion the State Board of Education wants.

Graves will present his budget proposal to lawmakers in January, based on recommendations from the Budget Division.

Investors raise UPS's value when stock 1st goes public

ATLANTA — United Parcel Service became a publicly traded company Wednesday, and investors quickly bid up the share price by more than 30 percent.

In its first hour of trading on the New York Stock Exchange, the world's biggest package carrier was up $18 from its initial offering price of $50 per share on early volume of about 46 million shares.

The offering of 109.4 million shares, or about 10 percent of the Atlanta-based company, became the biggest domestic initial public offering to date at $5.47 billion. That easily surpassed the previous largest IPO of $4.4 billion when oil company Conoco Inc., went public in October 1998.

The offering came a day after the successful debut of shares in Microsoft co-founder Paul Allen's Charter Communications. The cable company's stock shot up 20 percent in its first day of trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Analysts say UPS is an instant blue chip on Wall Street, which likes the company's strong performance record and prospects for snaring a sizable portion of the business of delivering merchandise that has been purchased online.

UPS reported net income of $1.7 billion on revenues of $24.8 billion last year.

UPS employees and retirees own about two-thirds of the company.

While UPS' promising future in e-commerce deliveries will lure many investors, the company's financial performance over the long haul is even more enticing, said Cameron McLennan, a logistics and transportation analyst.

Judge sentences boy to life for Oregon school shooting

EUGENE, Ore. — Kip Kinkel, the 17-year-old who filled his journal with rage, self-loathing and fantasies of violence, was sentenced to nearly 112 years in prison Wednesday for gunning down his parents and going on a rampage in his high school cafeteria that left two students dead.

Kinkel will not be entitled to parole, meaning that unless the governor commutes his sentence, he will die behind bars for the attack at Thurston High School in Springfield.

After hearing days of wrenching statements from victims' relatives and many of the 25 people wounded, Judge Jack Mattison said it was more important to make the victims feel safe than to try to rehabilitate Kinkel.

Before the sentence was issued, Kinkel read an apology from a small sheet of white paper.

"I absolutely loved my parents and had no reason to kill them. I had no reason to dislike or try to kill anyone at Thurston. I am truly sorry for all of this," he said. "These events have pulled me to a state of deterioration and self-loathing that I didn't know existed."

He stood with his hands clasped in front of him as the judge gave him what amounts to a life sentence. Kinkel was 15 when he went on the shooting spree in May 1998 and therefore is ineligible for the death penalty.

Many victims said they were satisfied with the sentence and hoped someday to get on with their lives.

"I am so glad Kip Kinkel will be put behind the bars," said Teresa Miltonberger, who nearly died after being shot in the head. "If he wasn't, I wouldn't feel safe."

Kinkel's attorneys said the sentence is too harsh and they plan to appeal. "There was some possibility of a better result at trial. We're very disappointed," attorney Rich Mullen said.

After being expelled from school for having a stolen gun in his locker, Kinkel killed his parents at their home on May 20, 1998. The next day, he donned a trenchcoat and drove to school with three guns and thousands of rounds of ammunition and opened fire on the packed cafeteria. Mikael Nickolauson and Ben Walker were killed.

Kinkel later told doctors he had been hearing voices telling him to kill since he was 12. Experts testified he was psychotic, probably paranoid schizophrenic, and deeply depressed.

Spurned German suitor kills 6 before shooting himself

BERLIN — A spurned suitor who killed six members of a Turkish family living in Germany shot himself to death Wednesday after a car chase with police, authorities said.

The gunman, a 34-year-old Turk identified only as Mehmet K., shot three women and three men Tuesday night in an apartment in the northern city of Bielefeld, apparently after the family turned down his request to marry one of the women, police said.

Mehmet K., a married father of four who worked as a Muslim religion teacher and prayer leader, had lost his position in a mosque after his affair with the 19-year-old woman became known, prosecutor Klaus Metzler said. The woman and her family then refused to have any further contact with him.

The 19-year-old woman was among the dead. Her 17-year-old sister, who initially had been reported dead, was in critical condition in a hospital, police said.

Their father, 61, also was killed along with four other adult relatives, police said.

The mother, 53, was in the apartment but not harmed, along with her three youngest children and two grandchildren.

Mehmet K. fled the apartment after the shootings. Hours later, police in Tuebingen, about 300 miles to the south, spotted him in his car. After leading police on a chase, he shot himself in the head, police said.

The man had been living in Tuebingen with his wife and four children, police said.

Polygamy is practiced by some in rural areas of Turkey, although most of the additional marriages are religious ones, since law only allows one wife.

Leslie Small, sophomore in agricultural economics, will begin training Dec. 3 to serve as Central Region vice president for FFA. The position will require Small to take a year away from K-State.

REED DUNN/ COLLEGIAN

K-State student to travel U.S. with FFA

BY RHONDA NIDA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three months of preparation, six years of dedication and a lifetime of support from friends and family have given one student the opportunity to travel across the United States to serve more than 450,000 young people in the National FFA Association.

Leslie Small, sophomore in agricultural economics, will take a year of absence from K-State to serve as the 1999-2000 Central Region FFA vice president. Small was elected to her term at the National FFA Convention Oct. 27-30 in Louisville, Ky. During her year of service, she will travel more than 100,000 miles to every corner of the United States to meet, educate and assist FFA members.

Small said she is excited to meet young people and have a positive influence on their lives.

"Young people have so many problems today," she said. "It is important for them to have a positive place to turn to. I hope to further this organization's goals of helping those young people. This is a role I take very seriously and with a lot of pride. I have a year of service with the opportunity to make a difference in 450,000 students' lives. That's what this means to me."

National FFA officers travel throughout the United States to visit high school students, attend state FFA conventions and greenhand conferences and tour agricultural businesses.

Small and six other candidates were chosen by members of a nominating committee to lead the FFA association. The committee, composed of nine FFA officers from across the United States, was chosen by the National FFA officer team from the previous year.

Preparation for this position has been a semester-long process, Small said. Candidates for national FFA office go through a series of intense interviews in areas such as agriculture and education in both group and one-on-one sessions. To get ready for the rounds of interviews, Small said she went through practice rounds with numerous College of Agriculture faculty members as well as organizations like the Kansas Livestock Association, 21st Century Alliance, agribusiness firms and area school systems and school boards.

"Everything I did was to become more in touch with myself," Small said. "I wanted to understand my own strengths and weaknesses and what I could contribute to a team. These are the things I wanted to portray to the nominating committee in my answers. I had to go through a lot of soul-searching. The committee really gets to know you, and they know whether you are in it for the right reasons or not."

Understanding the issues young people are facing in high school was important to Small in order to offer true experience in her answers to the committee.

"I met with local school boards to find out what issues students are facing, where they stood on those issues and why," she said. "I wanted to find out these things and be able to give examples of real experiences in my answers to the nominating committee."

In addition to gaining communication skills and educating herself on current agriculture and education issues, Small said she made it a point to be in good physical shape for her week of national interviews.

Flexibility, long-distance friendships highlight general's Air Force career

BY CHRISTINA HOGGATT

U.S. Air Force Gen. Richard B. Myers said he never dreamed of becoming the next vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Myers, commander in chief of the North American Aerospace Defense Command and U.S. Space Command, graduated from K-State in 1965 with a bachelor's degree in mechanical engineering and earned his commission through the Air Force ROTC program at K-State.

MYERS

"I really enjoyed my time at K-State. My experience was very positive," Myers said. "The first time I flew, I knew that was what I wanted to do. I liked flying and that really gave me focus."

Myers credits his former Air Force ROTC Department Head Lee Ruggles for getting him into the flight introductory program, where Myers' passion for flying began.

"I credit him a lot. If he wouldn't have went the extra mile for me, I probably wouldn't be where I am today," Myers said. "I will forever be indebted to him."

Ruggles said he thinks Myers earned his own in his career, and he is very proud of Meyers and his abilities.

"I have so much admiration for him and am so proud that he has gone through the system using his own abilities and had proven himself quite well," Ruggles said. "Besides his evident leadership abilities, he is such a humble and down-to-earth person, which is a wonderful attribute, especially with all the pressures of his positions."

Myers said his initial goal in the Air Force was to serve his five years. He said after pilot training, he wasn't sure what he wanted to do. He decided, however, to stay in the Air Force because of the camaraderie among the people and the sense of worthwhile in defending the nation.

"I just never looked back," Myers said. "My wife, Mary Jo, is also one of the reasons I am here. She has been so willing to be here and is a big part of my career."

Mary Jo Myers said the most exciting part of being in an Air Force family is being around dedicated people who share a general enthusiasm for their job.

"It has been a wonderful way of life, and the camaraderie we share is really exciting and gives a true sense of stability," she said. "We have maintained lifelong friends all over the world, and the main key has been flexibility."

Myers and his wife said they agree living in 24 homes over 30 years has been a great adventure.

"We both loved Germany and Europe in general," Richard said. "Our longest was six years in Japan, where we had two daughters."

K-State Air Force ROTC department head Col. Stan Weir said Myers is a credit to himself and to the Air Force ROTC system. He said K-State ROTC is fortunate to have had so many great leaders come through the system, including Gen. Myers.

"Gen. Myers has done an outstanding job and is certainly the most notable and in some terms most successful general to come through the K-State Air Force ROTC program," Weir said. "The number of lives he's touched as a commander — that is where his legacy will be.

"The lives and people he has affected and inspired through his leadership is what will be his true legacy," Weir said.

Myers said he credits his leadership abilities to his career. He said people develop leadership skills though positions in a career, huge doses of academic schools and by observing good and bad leaders.

"The biggest key in becoming a good leader is the people," Myers said. "The people you lead make all the difference.

"A leader must be able to delegate and motivate his people and have the utmost trust in them and their abilities, because the people are the important key in making things happen," he said.

Myers has earned more than 10 awards and decorations, including Distinguished Service Medal, Legion of Merit and the Distinguished Flying Cross with oak leaf cluster. He has flown more than 3,900 hours in aircraft ranging from the T-33 to the F-16 and F-15.

He said one of the most intriguing times in his career was when he was the advisor to Secretary of State Madeleine Albright in 1996-97.

"We would travel all over the world, and it was absolutely fascinating," Myers said. "The U.S. is one of the few countries where the State and Defense Departments are directly together."

Through 10 promotions and becoming a four-star general, Myers still remains a very humble and dedicated professional, Ruggles said.

"Despite the high peaks in his career, Myers still admits to never dreaming of achieving such a high military position," he said.

Myers recently took leadership over the new defense strategies on cyber warfare. He said as people progress, the technology will get broader and broader, and an understanding of technology is a necessity.

"The nation is in good hands with Myers holding one of the strongest military positions today," Ruggles said.

Holiday offers chance to remember veterans

Americans fought for your right to read this editorial and for our right to publish it. Sometimes, we take that right, as well as others, for granted.

Many who fought for our life, liberty and ability to pursue happiness, died long ago, either in the heat of battle or years after their battles were fought. But some have survived, and on this day — Veterans Day — we honor them.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

At 11 a.m. on Nov. 11, 1921, America honored her World War I veterans by burying an unknown soldier at Arlington National Cemetery. France and England had similar ceremonies. We called it Armistice Day and selected the day to give significance to the end of World War I, which ended on the 11th hour of the 11th day of the 11th month.

We still might call it Armistice Day. But "armistice" means an end of warfare, and part of the holiday was the celebration of the end of the War to end all wars. Shortly after the first celebration, however, Europe became embroiled in an even bigger war, World War II. More than 762,000 Americans died in the ensuing battle.

Rather than abandon the national holiday honoring World War I soldiers, Kansas Representative Edwin K. Rees introduced a bill to change Armistice Day to Veterans Day and celebrate Americans who served in all wars. President Dwight Eisenhower signed it into law in 1954.

The holiday still appears on the calendar today, but many Americans have forgotten its significance. At the very least, many of us have allowed the sacrifices of American soldiers to fade into the farthest corners of our minds. Today, of all days, we should brush the cobwebs from those corners and make an effort to celebrate and remember their sacrifices.

Call the veterans you know and thank them. Make an effort to learn their sacrifices, so their stories don't die with them. Thank current soldiers for their willingness to pick up arms today and defend those same rights. Visit the graves of soldiers long lost and honor their memory. Attend Manhattan's parade in honor of local soldiers. Most importantly, remember the freedoms you are enjoying this very day are a direct result of American soldiers past and present, and don't take that for granted.

Victoria's Secret's expansion into Manhattan just another step toward total domination

VIEWPOINT

TRAVIS D. LENKNER

We begin today with a simple lesson in underwear economics: It's sometimes really easy to sell things that few other people ever will see.

Yes, Microsoft has a teensy-weensy monopoly over other computer software manufacturers. But the government is wasting its time.

Instead of spending millions to prosecute handsome little Bill Gates, Janet Reno, also pretty handsome, should consider siccing the Justice Department on a different beast: Victoria's Secret.

Since this store of all stores soon will make its debut in Manhattan, what better time than the present for our local religious leaders to stop bawling about the loss of the Ten Commandments monolith and work on getting Manhattan Town Center to move those satin Victoria's Secret sales hussies back to Junction City where they belong?

SHANE FOSBURG/COLLEGIAN

The holiday season is approaching quickly, and with it comes the onslaught of underwear commercials most guys know and love. Personally, I can be on the telephone, in the shower or standing on my head until I hear the familiar, rhythmic soundtrack of the commercials wafting through my television. Then it's time to quit, stare at the screen and look at the pretty dancing ladies.

What choice do we have, Americans? We are blindsided by models in underwear and feathery, taped-on wings dancing to and fro on our electronic picture boxes.

They writhe and jive their way into our hearts — Tyra, Stephanie and the rest of the angels. And when they're done, we all feel a little bit cheaper.

The sales strategy is impressive.

First, the catalog.

If you do not have one of these holiday catalogs, you should run to the nearest Quickie Lube, where Earl, Bill and all the gang are sure to be poring over this thick, glossy book of fancy underwear. "Well, look here, Bob — it's one uh them front-closin' thangs with the plastic fastenin' jobs. Is thar uh secret to gettin' them thangs undone?"

This book is worth the price of a subscription to the catalog (free) and so much more. It is bathroom reading for men ages 10 to 99, and it will stay there in its place of honor with Kansas Farmer and Auto Weekly until next Christmas when the new styles debut.

How about the Internet site? www.victoriassecret.com.

Stop by and visit the bra salon, where perfectly proportioned models will show you any bra in any size — including, for instance, a 44D or a 38DD. Actually, they will show you the 34C or a 34C. Use your imagination.

Or, spend some time in the glam lounge looking at behind-the-scenes photos from the models' catalog shoots and cosmetic surgeries. (Some footage may be too graphic for children or models preparing for cosmetic surgeries.)

Technology is good, right?

But if you're looking for the total lingerie experience, waste no time in rushing to the nearest suburb-of-a-larger-town mall and cruising past a Victoria's Secret store.

A few years back when bra sales were spiraling south — no pun intended — and nationwide panty usage statistics were at an all-time low, Victoria's Secret marketers made a key decision: sell other stuff.

Notice the lotions, body scrubbers, soaps and perfumes that now line the outer walls of most Victoria's Secret stores. They are only a ruse, gentlemen, designed to lure you into the mall and let you smell the sweet, lovely smells of half-naked mannequins.

If you are a bit shy about walking directly into lace nighties and brassieres, you'll fall for the "here's-the-other-half-of-the-store-with-no-scary-underwear-within-10-feet" trick. Within five minutes, an attractive sales associate will steer you toward this week's thong special, and your guard is down. You'll walk out the front door with a $200 bag of underwear, two bottles of lotion and a free loofah — whatever those are.

Justice Department, City Commission, Gov. Bill Graves: unite. These corporate wizards are using beautiful women to objectify women and force men into buying things they never want to see with the lights on.

Victoria's Secret should be broken into smaller companies by region, á la the telephone industry. I don't think anyone would mind Southwestern Victoria's Secret, Victoria's Secret/MCI WorldBra or other such companies.

Reno and the rest of the Justice Department should take note: Christmas is coming, and Santa doesn't appreciate hostile takeovers.

There's more to successful life than living in fairy-tale world

VIEWPOINT

ERIN SCHNEWEIS

Damn Cinderella.

I'd like to show Snow White or Sleeping Beauty a not-so-nice form of sign language, a.k.a. the finger.

Damn them all.

They gave me the notion of the prince, the white horse and of challenges gloriously overcome by love. It was their stories that made me foolishly believe a pumpkin could turn into a stagecoach. Their stories gave me hope that a fairy godmother could solve all of my problems with a magical wand.

And now it isn't happening.

Don't get me wrong, I have tried. Maybe my problem is I have tried too hard.

Yet still, I have a few tricks up my sleeve.

An example is that I could turn Cinderella into Erinella. Go to a party and "accidentally" leave one shoe behind. Since I'm the only girl who wears a size 8 1/2, at K-State my prince automatically will come knocking on my door.

When that one doesn't pan out, the next stop could be "Snow Yellow." (Sorry, the dog got to the snow beforehand.) I could go to the grocery store and get a rotten apple. This results in food poisoning. I've always heard the No. 1 way to meet men is a combo of vomiting and the Emergency Room.

Maybe not.

There is always "Beauty and the Beast." I could go to Aggieville and look for my special someone. After all, beauty is in the eye of the beer holder.

If I were someone else at some other school, this whole notion of fairy tales might come true. But for now, things aren't looking pretty.

I don't blame Disney. I blame myself. Why did I allow myself to be swept away by the whole idea of the perfect world?

As I write this, I realize I don't need it. I don't need the fairy tale.

I am going to save my money and buy my own white horse.

Instead of hoping for flowers, I will grow my own. Rather than waiting on someone else to fulfill my emotional needs, I will do things I want. No more sitting around waiting on someone else to show me life's beauty, instead I will show myself.

Perhaps I will never have someone to brush my teeth with at night. Don't fret, I will still brush them. It could be I will have no one to read my poetry to, but still I will write it.

Maybe I will try to forget the notion of someone watching me sleep as I lie in their arms. It might be that no prince will ever come riding up to my house. And I might never be serenaded by someone hitting beer cans against my window underneath the pale moonlight.

There will be no more expecting frogs to turn into princes. There will be the realization that once a frog, always a frog.

No more hoping that pumpkins will turn into carriages, and Silverado Saloon will turn into a magical ballroom.

I no longer will wait for someone or something else to make my life fine and dandy.

Don't get me wrong — love is the best thing in the world. I am not giving up on love or calling it quits on romance. Merely, I am giving up the notion that I need someone else to make me a full person. Because I don't.

Poor Cinderella. She found every ounce of happiness through someone else.

Thanksgiving brings opportunity for city residents to help needy

Editor,

Do you have plans for the Thanksgiving Holiday? How about making your community neighbors happy and making you feel good at the same time? Volunteer to assemble food baskets at the Flint Hills Breadbasket on Nov. 21, 1-4 p.m. If that is not possible, volunteer to distribute baskets Nov. 22, or deliver baskets to the elderly or shut-in Nov. 23-24.

Thanks to all of you who so graciously give your time, gifts and talents. We are reaching Mayor Roger Reitz's goal of collecting 150,000 pounds of food.

But volunteers are needed to assemble and distribute more than 2,000 baskets for Thanksgiving distribution. Please call the Breadbasket at 537-0730 and schedule your family, student organization, church group or just yourself to help with one or more of these events. Then, after an energizing week's work, mark your calendar to attend the Community Thanksgiving Dinner on Nov. 25 at noon at the Manhattan High School East campus. Enjoy a delicious turkey dinner with all the trimmings with your friends and neighbors.

Thank you for remembering our friends and neighbors during the holiday season.

Headline in Collegian misleading; hiring freeze tool to lower budget

Editor,

I am writing to clarify a few points covered in Bryan Scribner's article titled "Hiring Freeze Halts Faculty Raises" in Wednesday's Collegian.

I indicated to Scribner during my interview that the governor has the authority to impose a hiring freeze on state employees, but he does not have the authority to reduce budget allocations without specific legislative action.

As a result, K-State has implemented the hiring freeze announced by the governor, but the 1-percent budget rescission he announced several weeks ago is only a recommendation until the year 2000 Legislature authorizes it.

The headline on the story was misleading.

Some might read it to imply the freeze will roll back salary increases already provided for the current fiscal year.

This, of course, is totally wrong. Others might conclude the hiring freeze prevents salary increases for the coming year. This also is totally wrong.

The hiring freeze prevents us from filling certain faculty and staff vacancies during the current year — it is a tool the governor has chosen to use to help reduce state funding.

The combination of approved expenditure levels, projected state revenue and required year-end balances are the factors that suggest it will be very difficult to obtain funding for our request to increase unclassified salaries by 8.5 percent for the coming year.

As the story indicates, we are continuing to pursue the requested increase despite the rather gloomy outlook at the present time.

Julie Thomas lets out a scream as she watches the flight of the ball she just dug during the Wildcats' match against Texas in Ahearn Field House on Wednesday evening. The Wildcats dropped the Longhorns in three straight games, 15-10, 15-4 and 15-9.

Cats defeat No. 14 Texas

BY IVAN KOZAR
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State volleyball team entered Wednesday night's match determined to knock off the Big 12 Conference front-runner Texas Longhorns.

That's exactly what they did.

It took the No. 19 Wildcats (17-6, 11-4) only three games to knock off No. 14 Texas (17-5, 11-4).

The victory marks the first three-game sweep in Ahearn Field House by the Cats since they took down Iowa State on Sept. 29.

"We knew going into this that this wasn't going to be easy," Disney Bronnenberg, K-State sophomore setter, said. "We worked our butts off to get it."

The Cats jumped out to a 5-1 lead in game one, but the powerful Texas offense came back and tied the game at 6 on a kill by Texas junior setter Jill Gremmel.

The Wildcats went up 14-10 and won the first game on an out-of-bounds hit by Texas senior middle blocker Erin Aldrich.

"We stayed on it the whole night," head coach Jim McLaughlin said. "Our block and our defense was really good — we put more pressure on them than they could handle."

Game two was dominated by the Cats as the defense stepped up and held the Longhorns to only four points.

With the score tied at 4, the K-State volleyball team scored 11 unanswered points to win 15-4.

K-State senior outside hitter Dawn Cady led the Cats with eight kills and six digs in the game, which also featured strong serves from the Cats.

"It was the best serving night we've ever had, so we took them out of system," McLaughlin said.

"Then we charted the tendencies on their hitters and got on their tendencies. That was enough to put them away."

In game three, the Cats jumped out to an early 6-0 lead before Texas could put a point on the board.

With the score 14-9, Cady got the final point with a kill.

"We've been in a rut for a while, and this is very big for our team," Liz Wegner, outside hitter for K-State, said. "We came out and played great."

The Wildcats are now in a three-way tie with Texas and No. 15 Texas A&M for No. 2 in the conference.

K-State is looking only to improve with five conference games to go, rather than looking down the road towards the Big 12 Conference Championship.

"I think that we've stopped looking at title runs right now and saying look, what do we got to do to get better, individually and as a team, rather than just looking at all the titles, because if you do that, you lose sight on what you're doing," Bronnenberg said.

The Wildcats' next test will be against Missouri on Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

Top Recruit

Women's basketball coach expects signee to make immediate contributions to team

STORIES BY SARAH CRAIG

The K-State women's basketball team signed the top Kansas recruit Wednesday in Laurie Koehn, a guard from Moundridge.

Koehn is considered one of the top six point guards in the nation, averaging 30 points, four rebounds and four steals per game. She led her team to the 2A state title in each of the three years she's played, holds state tournament scoring records and was two-time Associated Press Kansas Girls Player of the Year.

"Laurie's just such a phenomenal young talent," Coach Deb Patterson said. "I anticipate that she'll be able to come in and make an immediate impact on the perimeter."

While K-State has contacted Koehn since her sophomore year, Patterson said it's been on her mind for much longer than that.

"Since the day I was born, I dreamed of signing a player like Laurie," she said. "Nationally, the signing of Laurie has put K-State women's basketball on the map."

Koehn said the decision to play for K-State was easy, although at the age of 12, when she started her routine of taking 500 shots a day, she was a KU fan. She attributes her change of heart and decision to be a Wildcat to the people whom she met in her campus visits.

"It was definitely the people. I love the coaches, I love the players, and I don't think that I could find better coaches to play for or better people to play with," Koehn said. "I just knew it was where I belonged."

Koehn's daily workout now consists of 700 shots, usually making 88 out of 100 three-pointers in these workouts. When she started playing, she had one goal in mind.

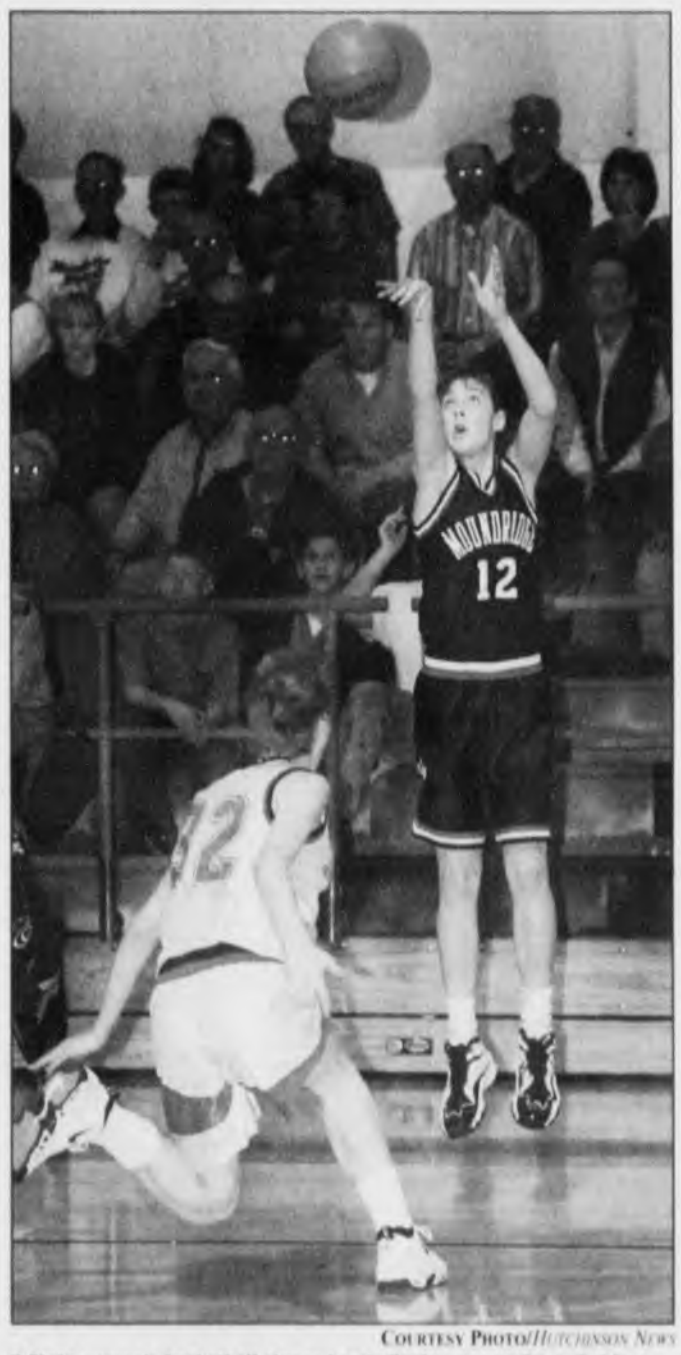
"My goal was to play Division I somewhere. I didn't know where, but that was definitely the motive," Koehn said.

Koehn is a three-sport athlete, playing volleyball in the fall and running track in the spring. She said she couldn't imagine taking a break anytime soon.

Patterson said this work ethic, as well as experience on a quality high school team, make Koehn the kind of player she wants on her team.

"She knows how to win, and she knows what it takes to win," Patterson said. "Any time you're coming from a program that's won three state titles, you're coming from a sound program."

Koehn will play the shooting guard while current point guard April Sailors will continue with her role at the point.



Sailors said she looks forward to playing with Koehn because they share a winning mindset.

"This is a very strong recruiting class," Sailors said. "I've seen them play and I think they're going to fit in very well here because they all want to work hard and keep moving up. That's what our program is all about."

Some of Koehn's final choices included Colorado, Iowa State, Oklahoma, Nebraska and NC State, which she said was the runner-up.

Her high school coach Sue Hetzke, who has worked with her for six years, said she is happy with Koehn's decision.

"I feel secure that her choice was the correct choice for her," Hetzke said. "She's so happy and confident in what she chose that I'm ecstatic with her choice because it was the correct one."

K-State women's basketball signee Laurie Koehn goes up for a shot in a high school game last season. Koehn signed with K-State on Wednesday.

Women's basketball team gains 4 commitments, notches 1 of conference's top classes

K-State topped the list of recruits in the Big 12 on Wednesday with four athletes committing, including two Kansas standouts — Laurie Koehn and Nicole Ohlde.

Head coach Deb Patterson said this is the best recruiting class she's seen at K-State and probably the best in the Big 12 this year.

"I have to believe that this signing class is one of the top in the Big 12," Patterson said. "I just think it's because we had some quality talent in the state of Kansas and they happened to be national-caliber players."

At 6 feet 4 inches, Ohlde earned accolades at the guard position, as she was named to the 4A first team all-state last year and player of the year for All-North Central Kansas League.

Patterson said she immediately was interested in Ohlde when she saw Ohlde had the skills of a guard and the height to play the post.

"I remember when she came to our camp a few years back and she was playing point guard," Patterson said. "When I found out she had a high school coach that would let her dribble, I was ecstatic."

Ohlde averaged 18 points, 12.9 rebounds, 3.2 assists, 2.2 blocks and 2.3 steals in her time at Clay Center High School.

Ohlde said her height gives her a definite advantage inside, proven by her 12.9 rebounds and 2.2 blocks.

"If a smaller guard comes on me, I can post them up, and if somebody bigger comes on me, I can usually drive around them, so my height helps," she said.

The Cats also picked up commitments from two post players, one of whom is Andrea Armstrong from Lakeside, Ore. Armstrong averaged 12.7 points and 10.1 rebounds per game last year, shooting 47.5 percent from the field.

Patterson said she knew early on in K-State's summer camp that Armstrong was an effective player.

"At our Elite Camp, it took me about 15 minutes to figure out that she just kept catching my eye, catching my eye," Patterson said. "When she is on the floor she just brings such incredible enthusiasm and work ethic to the floor."

Patterson compared Armstrong to senior center Angie Finkes in that they both make things happen because they are so competitive.

Armstrong said she is excited to join the team and hopes to be a big contributor.

"I look forward to being with the team and the coaching staff. I can't wait to get over there," Armstrong said. "I'm a good rebounder, I play good defense, I'm aggressive on offense and I just want to help the team as much as possible."

Amy Dutmer, a power forward from York, Neb., also committed Wednesday. She averaged 14.9 points, 10.5 rebounds,and 1.8 blocks per game last year. She said her ability to shoot both under the basket and from a long range are her strengths.

"I'm not as tall as some post players, so when I play underneath or when I'm at the forward position, they can bring me out against bigger players," Dutmer said. "I'm strong on defense too. I worked a lot on that this summer."

Dutmer was sidelined with a knee injury last season, but Patterson said her ability to return from the injury made her a wanted recruit.

"After that injury, when her status became uncertain, not only in our eyes but in everyone's eyes who had been recruiting her, she really stood the test and stayed strong and determined and focused," Patterson said.

"She was mentally very aggressive with her outlook, and those are attributes that are attest to their competitive nature."

Men's basketball team looks forward to Tuesday test against Arizona

■ Game against NBC Thunder tonight to take place before Wildcats open regular season.

BY ERICA COURTRIGHT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the members of the K-State men's basketball team head into their exhibition game against NBC Thunder tonight, its thoughts might be somewhere else.

The Wildcats will play their second exhibition matchup of the season before opening their regular season in Tucson, Ariz., on Tuesday against the Arizona Wildcats in the preseason NIT.

While the Wildcats are looking to improve against the Thunder, Arizona, not exhibiton games is on their minds, head coach Tom Asbury said.

"We're just looking strictly at Arizona," he said. "I don't want to say they are not important. It's just a different kind of importance. They're meaningless in the record, but necessary for us to evaluate our guys."

With the Wildcats losing six exhibition games in a row, Asbury said more importance is put on improving in exhibition contests rather than winning them.

"It's just a glorified scrimmage," he said.

K-State is looking for its first win of the season against the Thunder after falling to the California All-Stars 79-78 on Friday. Galen Morrison's shot at the buzzer fell inches short after Mack Tuck hit the winning field goal for the All-Stars.

K-State ended the first half with a 49-39 lead but allowed the All-Stars to go on a 25-4 run in the second half.

A 9-2 run by the Cats knotted the score at 78 with less than a minute to play, but with four seconds to go, Travis Reynolds fouled Tuck.

Tony Kitt led the effort with 16 points and nine rebounds, while four other Wildcats also finished in double digits.

Asbury said several players, including Kitt, turned in solid performances, but there still is room for improvement.

"At this time of year everything needs improvement," he said.

Heading into tonight's game, Asbury said he hopes to see improvement in each player. He said he is looking for the experienced players to step up, while the less experienced players will work to gain confidence.

Tonight marks the fourth time the Cats have faced the NBC Thunder.

The Thunder lead the overall series at 2-1, having downed K-State 83-79 a year ago. The NBC Thunder were 0-3 this season heading into a game with Saint Louis on Wednesday.

Program gives fans game info

■ Radio show almost as good as attending game in person.

So what if you have to stay here in Manhattan this weekend instead of being able to go to the big Nebraska game in Lincoln?

KRIJ ALLIS

You probably feel a little left out. You are going to be out of the loop, and you aren't getting enough coverage of the Wildcats.

Let me tell you about a little secret that might help get your day started off right and let you know what is going on in Lincoln.

It is the Powercat GameDay pregame show.

The shows hosts are Matt Walters, the program director for KMAN-AM 1350, and Tim Fitzgerald, Powercat Illustrated editor and publisher.

If you haven't listened to them before, now is the perfect weekend to start.

They start the broadcast four hours before game time and are on the air two hours and 10 minutes. When K-State is at home, they have been stationed at a bar in Aggieville; the last couple of times it has been at Tula's Out of Bounds Sports Bar and Grill.

Fitzgerald said the event attracts a decent sized crowd for home games, but the larger crowds show up at away games.

Walters said there have been many establishments that have run out of beer because they didn't expect so many people. The location at which they broadcast becomes a meeting ground for the purple fans who travel.

Fitzgerald said he thinks more people are starting to recognize that they can meet at the bar before and after the game. The location for Powercat Gameday is transformed into a safe haven for Wildcat fans.

In Lincoln, they will be broadcasting at Main Street Cafe. The same people who own 12th Street Pub own this establishment.

The broadcast will begin at 10:50 a.m. Trust me, it is worth listening to on KMAN or KMKF-FM 101.5.

The hosts' knowledge of K-State football is amazing. They have insight, know the program from top to bottom and can get any Wildcat fan ready for the game.

Besides understanding the players, fans and coaches of K-State, they also make it interesting to talk about them. The chemistry Walters and Fitzgerald have is great. They have known each other for almost 10 years, and they feed off of each other perfectly.

Plus, you can tell they enjoy what they are doing.

What definitely is an advantage for both of them is that they have been around K-State for a long, long time. Fitzgerald went to school at K-State even before head coach Bill Snyder arrived, so he knows the history of K-State football. He grew up watching the Wildcats.

Walters didn't, but he has learned about K-State's past, which helps him tie the past with the present. Walters' ability to do that ultimately gives more insight for the listener.

They don't just talk about K-State, either. They also go through the Big 12 games of the week, give insight on top-25 matches and talk to people from around the country. Last year, Walters said he had a lot of fun interviewing legendary play-by-play broadcaster Keith Jackson.

Another interview was with math whiz Jeff Sagarin in St. Louis, and both said they didn't have a clue as to what he was talking about.

The show does not just stop there. Listeners also can call in and ask burning questions they have about the Wildcats or about college football in general. Both will answer these questions to the best of their abilities.

Since Nebraska is such a big game, Fitzgerald said he expects it to be the most chaotic broadcast because of the large number of people.

Nevertheless, they are looking forward to it.

"It is a lot of fun with large crowds. It gives you a different energy," Fitzgerald said. "Some weeks when Matt and I don't have a crowd, we just are sitting there talking to each other. We really feed off a crowd."

So Wildcat fans, if you are traveling to Nebraska, go visit them, listen to what they say, drink some beer and go root the team on to victory. If you are here, get up by 10:50 a.m. and listen in so you can feel like you are a part of the atmosphere in Lincoln. It no doubt will get prepare you for watching the game at a bar, your house, your friend's house or wherever you are.

Trust me, it is worth the time.

THURSDAY'S health question

Q: Does lifting weights affect your height?

A: "No, lifting weights does not make a person permanently shorter," said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center. "The development of muscles does not alter a person's height. Those who lift heavy weights while doing squats can temporarily become up to a half inch shorter. Remember, this is not a permanent height change. Staff at Lafene Health Center's Physical Therapy Department and at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex are available to answer questions regarding fitness, exercise safety and injury prevention."

Great American Smokeout offers help for nicotine-addicted

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For one day out of the year, smokers nationwide can unite in an effort to kick the habit.

The 23rd Annual Great American Smokeout, on Nov. 18, is sponsored by the American Cancer Society.

The American Cancer Society asks all smokers to put down their cigarettes and tobacco products on the day of the Smokeout in an effort to help them quit smoking and offers the public both education and support on the issue. The day is geared toward adolescent and adult smokers.

Reita Currie, registered nurse and health educator at Lafene Health Center, said Lafene has an active voice in the Smokeout this year.

"We're focusing on the awareness and ways to assist someone who is trying to quit," Currie said.

On Tuesday, Currie gave a presentation at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex in which she spoke of the risks of smoking and how it can affect one's mental and physical health, as well as one's sex life, causing impotence in men.

She said Lafene will have an information table set up Nov. 18 in the K-State Student Union as well.

Currie said the Smokeout gives smokers the perfect chance to quit, and that there are certain times when it would be difficult to do so.

"During finals and such, it is not a good idea to make any major life changes," she said.

"Oftentimes, also, smokers are not successful trying to quit the first time. It takes five to seven attempts to quit completely."

Mike Wright, junior in geology, said his first attempt at quitting wasn't successful.

"I chewed most of my pencils down to stubble," he said.

Currie said there are many resources available for those who wish to quit smoking, on the Smokeout or on any day, and that emotional support is necesary as well.

"There's patches, chewing gum and medication," she said. "For the most part, I find people use the gum and patches on their own, but personal contact with others is also very important."

Mike Rogers, sophomore in business, said emotional support is the key to trying to quit smoking.

"If you're trying to quit, you could find someone else who is trying to quit and form a buddy system," said Rogers, who has been smoking for five years. "I'm sure it could work for a lot of people."

The average age at which people begin smoking is age 13, Currie said, and these adolescents usually begin smoking daily at age 15.

Currie said people who start smoking during college usually smoke for social-related reasons.

"A lot of college students are social smokers," Currie said. "They don't have a severe dependency, and they mostly smoke with friends. It's a social situation."

Wright, who has been a smoker for three years, said he regrets taking up smoking because of the consequences.

"Had I known that it would get to the point where it was out of control, I wouldn't have started," Wright said.

Secondhand smoke can be just as dangerous, Currie said, putting those around a smoker at risk of developing diseases such as lung cancer.

"Most research is showing secondhand smoke can be just as harmful," she said.

Equally harmful are other tobacco products, such as chewing tobacco.

"People feel like it's less risky than smoking," Currie said.

Everyone has different motivations to quit smoking, Currie said, which can range from health concerns to a desire to save money.

Even if this year's Great American Smokeout doesn't boast dozens of stories about quitting, Wright said the day will, at least, make others put their smoking into perspective.

"It certainly gets people thinking about their habits," he said.

How much does smoking cost?

Braces, stretching keys to preventing sport-related injury

BY NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Riding the Disabled Service's shuttle bus to class everyday wasn't always the daily routine for Jeff Pierson, freshman in chemical engineering.

Moving around on campus from class to class using crutches is now his mode of transportation, due to a sports-related injury.

Pierson said he recently had taken up rollerblading and was skating down a ramp when his wheels got caught somewhere within the ramp, bringing him to a tumbling halt.

"I was playing it safe, doing the stuff I could do, and somehow it just happened," Pierson said.

With a surgery under his belt and a metal rod in his leg, Pierson is on the road to recovery.

"It should take about four to six months to heal," he said. "It sucks. I can't really do anything."

Pierson is one of many who have fallen victim to a sports- or workout-related injury.

Lanny Leroy, athletic trainer at Lafene Health Center, said people can decrease their chances of injury by taking the right preventative measures.

"The first step is to get a brace," Leroy said.

He said students limit the amount and range of motion of their ligaments by wearing a brace.

"You can still move, but it doesn't allow as much motion to occur, so that you don't damage the ligament," Leroy said.

He said the two most common sports injuries are sprained ankles and knees.

During the 1998-99 school year, Lafene treated 47 ankle sprains that occurred at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, Leroy said.

"Most are the result from playing basketball, either intramural or a pickup game," he said.

Last year's numbers showed a decrease from the previous year by almost half. In the 1997-98 school year, 93 ankle sprains were reported.

Leroy said the decrease could be attributed to an increase in preventative measures, such as taping and bracing.

"We are doing a lot more preventative measures with ankle sprains," Leroy said.

Another way to prevent an injury is by an exercise concept called proprioception. Leroy said proprioception takes training, but that it is the best way to prevent injury.

"It's training the muscles to prevent the injury from occurring in the first place," Leroy said.

The exercise includes two different methods of training.

Both involve balancing oneself, standing either on a suspended board or on a board placed upon a ball. The muscles are trained to maintain the body's balance while standing on the board.

By being trained in the right position, the muscles can then detect the wrong position, and correct it.

Shawna Jordan, certified athletic trainer, said the No. 1 reason workout injuries occur is due to inflexibility.

"If the muscles are tight, they are not able to go through the full range of motion," Jordan said. "By increasing your flexibility, you lengthen your muscle, which in turn will let you go through a full range of motion, putting less tension on the muscle."

She said not warming up and stretching properly beforehand can lead to injury.

"You need to warm up properly and go through a complete stretching routine before you work out," Jordan said.

A cool-down and stretching routine after a workout also is necessary, she said.

Jordan said another common cause of injury is due to people performing exercises or workouts they are not yet stong enough for.

"You need to build up a tolerance and endurance for it," Jordan said.

Not knowing the proper mechanics or techniques for what you are doing can lead to injury, she said.

If an injury such as a sprain does occur, both Jordan and Leroy said the acronym RICE describes just how to treat it — rest, ice, compression and elevation.

Leroy said the most important thing when dealing with an injury is to control the swelling.

"Ice for at least two to four days after injury. If it's still swollen, still use ice. When swelling is down, then use heat," Leroy said.

"You can get in trouble with using heat too soon, but you can never get in trouble with ice."

list has raised eyebrows in Manhattan and Wichita.

Watson has led Kansas' largest police department since 1994 and has worked on the force since 1976. He would take a $15,000 pay cut to leave the Wichita department, where his $45 million budget is more than six times larger than the RCPD's.

Watson said he'll take the smaller salary and department for a chance to return to his roots.

Watson and his wife, Kate, both attended high school in Junction City and are K-State alumni. Their three daughters — Anastasia, Emily and Shannon — all are K-State students.

"I have always told everybody that when I retired from here, I would love to go to the Manhattan area and get involved in law enforcement," Watson said.

Watson is friends with Johnson and said he spoke to Johnson about the job when he heard it was open.

Since taking over as Wichita chief, Watson said he has met several personal and professional goals. He said his emphasis on community policing programs in Wichita would be a good match for Riley County, and he would enjoy helping move into the new law-enforcement center.

"I could've retired here three years ago," Watson said. "I'm looking for new challenges, and even though Riley County is a small police department, I know they are very interested in community policing."

Watson said Wednesday he will run for Sedgwick County sheriff in 2000 if he's not hired by the RCPD.

"If we're a good fit, fine," Watson said. "If that doesn't work out, I'll be back here running for sheriff, I'm sure."

Two internal candidates also highlight the list. RCPD Operations Capt. French and Administrative Services Capt. Kyle both have worked at the department since before it consolidated in 1974. French started his police work in Ogden, Kans., in 1971; Kyle began as a Manhattan officer in 1973.

French, 51, leads the RCPD's patrol and investigations units with about 85 officers under his command. Kyle, 50, hires all department personnel, controls facilities and maintenance and oversees the RCPD budget.

Both men said their longtime experience with the department should be an asset in the selection process — especially since they've worked in local law enforcement since before the consolidation.

Both also said they have fresh ideas for running the department.

"If they say, 'We need someone with new blood and new ideas,' I hope I can convince them that I'm coming in with some new and progressive ideas," French said.

Kyle said the competition between he and French is congenial.

The other candidates are:

— Sam Breshears, a major in the Kansas City, Kan., police department since 1998. Breshears, 42, supervises about 100 officers, including the SWAT team, narcotics and bomb squads and the community policing program.

One of his three children, Brian, is a junior in pre-veterinary medicine at K-State.

Breshears started work at the Kansas City department when he left high school in 1976 — working through the cadet program and moving up in the ranks.

He said he would like to stay in Manhattan for the long-term and that his experience with community policing would help meet the department's goals.

"I'm not necessarily looking at other positions," Breshears said, "but this position happened to be so unique that I'm willing to change jobs at this stage in my career."

— Keith Carr, a former sheriff in Sullivan County, Tenn., who lost a 1998 reelection bid by about 200 votes in a county of more than 150,000.

Carr managed the 208-officer department for almost 10 years and served on the National Sheriffs' Association board. He had worked at the department since 1975.

Carr, 49, also teaches criminal justice courses at East Tennessee State University.

When asked whether he was at a disadvantage because of the number of internal and in-state candidates, Carr said that was a matter the law board will have to come to terms with for itself.

— Len Supenski, a retired Michigan police chief with experience in county, city, university and military law enforcement.

Supenski, 57, retired as Ypsilanti, Mich., police chief last month. He also was police chief at Penn State University, a bureau chief in Baltimore County, Md., and a military police officer in Frankfurt, Germany.

The Ypsilanti Police Department is slightly smaller than the RCPD.

Supenski said his 30 years' experience make him perfect for the RCPD job, which includes working with the city, county, K-State and Fort Riley.

"I have to sell my interest in the department, my interest in the community and my experience," Supenski said. "I have a great desire to be there."

A national consultant reviewed 57 applications for the director's seat, narrowing the field to 13 for the law board's consideration. The board made its list of six candidates at a closed-door October meeting.

None of the final 13 applicants were women or minorities, Snead said.

All of the candidates have master's degrees in criminal justice administration or an equivalent field.

The flight data recorder was designed to capture over 150 types of information from 55 aircraft systems over a rolling 25-hour period.

Among them were such things as the plane's altitude, speed, spin and roll, when electrical power was cut off and how the autopilot functioned.

Hall made his announcements moments after the safety board gave the public its first glimpse of the badly dented orange housing that contained the recorder, as well as the beige tape recorder itself.

The unit was pulled out of the ocean Tuesday and flown immediately to NTSB headquarters in Washington D.C., for analysis.

The recorder was still dripping sea water as officials from the board, flanked by Egyptian aviation officials and representatives of EgyptAir, held it up for photographers.

Hall said the recorder showed the plane did not hit supersonic speed in its initial descent.

He did not comment on how the airplane behaved after a brief climb shown by radar data, or in its final plunge to the ocean, which also was tracked on radar.

Hall also said the safety board was forming a committee to review the flight recorder data, a routine action.

He identified the participants as the NTSB, the Federal Aviation Administration, Egyptian authorities, the Boeing Co., which made aircraft, and Pratt & Whitney, which made the two engines that powered it.

Hall did not mention the FBI, which would likely be involved if analysts suspected the recorder documented any criminal activity. The agency continues to monitor the investigation.

He said Navy salvage crews continued to search for the plane's second so-called black box, the cockpit voice recorder. He told reporters the crews were no longer confused by the presence of an audio pinger that had fallen off the flight data recorder.

controls as we do," Getz said. "Wisconsin provides lump-sum payments to student organizations without substantial control over how they are spent. We require specifics of where it will go before we approve its allocation. Using funding for any expenses that would contribute to fulfilling an organization's political objectives is substantially limited, if not eliminated. As a result, the ultimate impact will probably be relatively minimal."

Getz said the difference between political and educational uses of the money sometimes can be a fine line and that the Supreme Court's ruling could force K-State to define more specifically for what activities the money cannot be used.

"Right now, the Allocations Committee has a fair amount of flexibility in deciding to what activities to allocate money," Getz said. "We might be forced to further tighten the restrictions on funding and specify particularly where funds cannot go. It is up to them how strict their ruling will be."

New Pakistani rulers file treason charges

By KATHY GANNON
The Associated Press

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Nearly one month after throwing out the civilian government Pakistan's new military rulers today accused deposed premier Nawaz Sharif and seven others of treason and kidnapping — charges that carry the death penalty.

A formal complaint was filed in connection with an incident Oct. 12, in which Sharif refused landing rights to a passenger aircraft carrying Army Chief Gen. Pervaiz Musharraf, police officials said. The dispute happened as Sharif's unpopular government was being thrown out in a bloodless coup led by Musharraf.

Under Pakistani law, a complaint was lodged with the police. A police inquiry will now be launched and formal charges made.

Sharif, who has been in military custody at an undisclosed location since his overthrow, was also accused of assembling people with the purpose to kill and physical endangerment, both of which carry prison terms.

Among those accused in the complaint are Sharif's former adviser Ghaus Ali Shah, former director of Pakistan's national airline Shahid Haqqan Abbasi, former Police Inspector Rana Maqbool and former director general of Pakistan Civil Aviation Aminuddin Chaudhry.

In Washington, D.C., the Clinton administration urged Musharraf's government to protect the legal rights of those accused.

"We have continued to raise our concerns with Pakistani authorities about former Prime Minister Sharif's well being and our concern he be accorded due process," Deputy State Department Spokesman James B. Foley said.

Foley said that the U.S. government did not have confirmation of the report.

The international community has been pressuring Pakistan's new rulers to announce a timetable for a return to democracy and a guarantee that Pakistani citizens' civil rights will be honored — including Sharif's.

The complaint stems from the high-altitude drama that occurred over the Karachi International Airport on Oct. 12 as the army fanned out on the ground and took control. Shortly before, Sharif had fired Musharraf and tried to induct a junior general and close ally as the new military chief.

The Pakistan International Airlines flight returning Musharraf to Pakistan from Sri Lanka was refused landing rights.

Musharraf said in an earlier interview that the pilot circled the airport awaiting instructions as fuel was running out. The aircraft was rerouted to the southern city of Nawabshah.

While the aircraft was en route, the army gained full control of the country — including the Karachi airport, and ordered the aircraft to land. When the aircraft landed at Karachi Airport, Musharraf said, there was less than 10 minutes of fuel remaining.

He accused Sharif at the time of attempting to kill him and endangering the lives of the more than 200 passengers and crew on board.

Professional animator plans to speak at K-State Monday

The College of Architecture, Planning and Design will sponsor a lecture by Jim Lammers, a professional animator, at 3:30 p.m. Monday in the K-State Student Union Little Theatre. Lammers has contributed shots to the TriStar film "Starship Troopers," which received an Oscar for best visual effects, and has written the textbook "3D Studio for Beginners" for MacMillan Publishing.

Lammers also has created advertising and broadcast animations for Hoescht Marion Roussell, Intertec, the Kansas City Royals, International Trucks and others. The event, which is free of charge, is open to the public and will be of interest to planners, architects, engineers, interior architects, landscape architects and animators.

Architecture exhibit shows evolution from idea to icon

The College of Architecture, Planning and Design will sponsor an exhibit entitled "The Lens of Architecture: Ronchamp Through Herve."

The exhibit, which opened Monday, will be displayed free of charge in the Chang Gallery of Seaton Hall through Nov. 23.

The exhibit will feature photographs of Le Corbusier's Notre Dame de Ronchamp taken by Lucien Herve. The photographs show how Notre Dame de Ronchamp evolved from idea to one of the most significant architectural icons of the 20th century. Herve has been commissioned to photograph Le Corbusier's work since 1949 and also has worked with many of the century's leading architects and artists.

Study by graduate student to be published in January

A study done by Lori Ballou, graduate student in communication disorders, is to be published in the January issue of the national journal Dysphagia, a multidisciplinary journal that deals with swallowing and its disorders.

Ballou began the study as a senior honors project.

The project studied the theory that people with impaired swallowing would find the pureed foods they eat more appealing if they were molded or shaped to resemble the food before it was processed.

FFA

Her schedule during the semester included exercise every morning at 6 and eating healthy foods.

"I wanted to eat well and be in good shape in order to feel better during the week," she said. "My friend Amy really helped by pushing me and running with me each day. I tried to maintain my daily schedule during convention to keep as normal as possible. I felt great during the week of convention."

The work of preparing to run for national office was not all done by Small herself. Small said she attributes her success to many people. Becky Zenger, sophomore in agricultural journalism, served as Small's traveling partner and scheduled interviews for her during the semester. After completing a mock interview, Zenger said the two would discuss what Small could improve on and the improvements from earlier in the process.

It was exciting to see her friend grow and improve and develop her skills throughout the fall, Zenger said.

"Leslie has a unique way of connecting with members and a true desire to serve the FFA organization," she said. "In addition to her willingness to serve, she is also very talented in communicating her ideas and beliefs while respecting others' thoughts and opinions.

"Her ability to work with all dynamics of people and her sincere love for agriculture and the FFA will make her an excellent leader and role model to FFA members across the nation."

Zenger said Small spent hours reading about agriculture and education issues, studying FFA information and reading material on leadership and personal development. These things were to prepare for an information test candidates took at the beginning of the convention.

She said Small was chosen as one of six officers out of a field of very strong candidates.

"Although she is a very talented individual, Leslie had to work incredibly hard and dedicated a large portion of her semester to preparing for Louisville," Zenger said. "Because of all the work she put into preparing herself, her achievement is even more valuable. Her abilities and recognition are a great credit to K-State and the Kansas FFA Association."

Small said it was very exciting to follow a path made by other K-State students. K-State has had four national officers in the past six years. Andy Armbruster, junior in agricultural economics, recently returned home to K-State after his year as the 1998-99 FFA Central Region vice president. Small said it was a neat experience to have one of her best friends precede her in office and an honor to present him with his retiring officer pin.

"She doesn't share her experiences to shine a light on herself, but to illustrate what can be accomplished if members are willing to work hard and be open to new ideas."

— Mary Kane, director of secondary education

"During convention, I just kept thinking, 'This is Andy's week,'" Small said. "It was so exciting to see him perform his officer duties. He had worked his whole life to this point. He was waiting at the end of the row to run me to the stage when my name was announced. It was a very special time for both of us."

Mary Kane, director of secondary education, said national officers are responsible for communicating the values of the organization, serving as a role model for the members and making a connection between the FFA and various partners of the organization.

Kane said Small was a successful candidate because she was able to communicate her willingness both to serve and represent the organization in a positive light because of her past experiences in agriculture and student groups.

"Leslie has had the opportunity to experience a great deal of success in the organization through leadership positions, career development events and travel," Kane said. "Any time she has the opportunity to work with the membership, she is searching for ways to incorporate her experiences so that they relate to the members.

"She doesn't share her experiences to shine a light on herself, but to illustrate what can be accomplished if members are willing to work hard and be open to new ideas."

As a national officer, Small said she expects to gain life experiences. The opportunity to teach young people, to enhance their lives and to grow as a person are a few of the benefits to look forward to, she said. She also said she knows she will grow a great deal from this experience in ways she does not yet realize.

"When I was reflecting on all my FFA experiences, everything the organization has given to me and what I could gain from this position, three themes came to my mind," she said. "I would have the chance to work on a team, grow as a person and the chance to work with young people.

"These were the things I had preached during my entire FFA career, and I hadn't realized it until then, but all of those things had already happened to me," she said. "I knew then that I had done everything I could to prepare myself to this point. I had interviewed well, met new people and I was stronger because of the experience."

These benefits will also help her later in life, she said.

"The service and team work experiences will help me become a better community member, a parent and team player," Small said. "I will gain people skills and be exposed to many walks of life. That is what I want to do."

Area teen-ager killed at rural railroad crossing while driving to school

STORY BY LAUREN BEATTY

ELVUE, Kan. — A 15-year-old girl was struck and killed by a train as she attempted to cross the railroad tracks near her home Thursday morning.

Becky Sester was a sophomore at Wamego High School. She died a few hours after the accident occurred at 7:10 a.m.

Kansas Highway Patrol trooper Karl Koenig was one of the officers on the scene. He said the accident took place just south of the 200 block of Noble Avenue. Sester was alone and driving a 1987 Chevrolet Cavalier.

Koenig said the cause of the accident is still under speculation.

He said Sester lived three blocks from the railroad and probably crossed it every day.

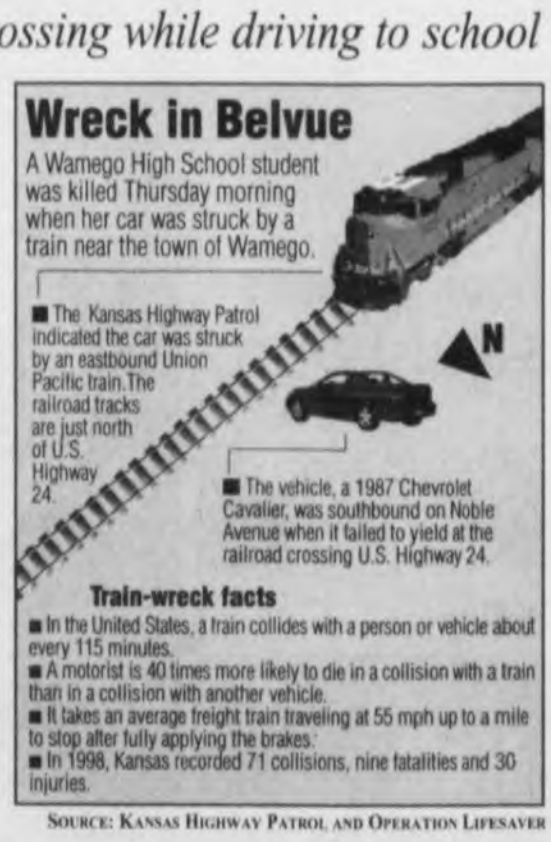
"We don't know whether she was trying to beat the train or she didn't see it coming," Koenig said. "We do know she failed to yield to the train. The conductor said to the engineer, 'She's not stopping. She's not stopping,' and then applied the emergency brakes."

Friends of Sester said the cause of the accident is the railroad tracks themselves.

"There are no guardrails, a torn-up stop sign, and the flashing lights go off too late," Amy Hernandez, a friend of Sester, said.

Hernandez's parents said they agree.

"It's a dangerous intersection," Julie Hernandez, Amy Hernandez's mother, said. "Trains just speed by these little towns. But whether it's a big or little intersection, they need to be checked to make sure they're all safe. This shouldn't have happened."



Koenig said railroads are checked by the Kansas Corporation Commission. KCC could not be reached for comment due to Veterans Day.

Friends of Sester said they hope the railroad problems will be taken care of soon, in order to avoid any other accidents.

"It's pretty sad that someone had to die for it to get some recognition," Hernandez said.

"If someone else has a problem with a railroad, speak up before it's too late," Tiffany Moman, a junior at Wamego High, said.

Day memorializes veterans' sacrifices

By TANNER EHMKE
Kansas State Collegian

The sacrifices of those who fought and died for their country were remembered Thursday in the Veterans Day Parade on Poyntz Avenue.

Gen. Freddy McFarren, 24th Infantry Division commander of Fort Riley, was the grand marshal of the celebration and keynote speaker of the ceremonies.

"I am touched when I see a city that takes time to honor their veterans," McFarren said at the ceremonies at the Wareham Opera House following the parade. "It is right and it is proper to take the time to thank those who have went before us."

The general called on veterans to step forward to tell their stories to the younger generation so that they might appreciate the sacrifices veterans made for the freedom they have taken for granted. A thousand veterans die every day, taking with them their history of service and commitment to their country, he said.

"The history of our country and our military are one in the same," McFarren said. "The army was established in 1775. Our military is as old as our country."

Lt. Col. Robert Kennedy of K-State's Army ROTC helped plan and organize the parade. Kennedy, the head of the Department of Military Science, volunteered his help. This was Kennedy's second year in volunteering to organize the parade.

More than 62 units of veterans, children, marching bands, tanks, jeeps and vintage cars participated in the parade, with some arriving without prior notice, but none were turned away. This was the largest Veterans Day Parade ever in Manhattan, Kennedy said. The biggest challenge was organizing the entire parade on time.

"The significance of the parade is to educate America of the importance of the military in establishing our freedom," Kennedy said. "We want to recognize those who fought."

Few political leaders have military experience, Kennedy said. There is little appreciation of the sacrifices of those who have paid to guarantee their freedom. The parade was a way of recognizing those who fought and showing our appreciation, he said.

But appreciation and patriotism were not the only things felt.

The thunder of a B1-Bomber was felt throughout the audience and parade as it flew high above the street lined with countless American flags. Flying behind the jet was a UH-60 Black Hawk helicopter from Fort Riley. A Soviet T-72 tank also was part of the parade. The tank was captured in Iraq during Operation Desert Storm. Leading the parade was McFarren in a vintage World War II vehicle.

In the end, the excitement was replaced with pride and sorrow as the crowd of veterans saluted the flag and remembered their comrades while a trumpet played "Taps."

"Our veterans made sacrifices for all of us," McFarren said. "We are truly blessed to be Americans."

BSU, Senate discuss adding minority seats

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

If the Student Governing Association does not acquire minority representation in the next election, six minority students might be appointed to Student Senate by next year.

Engineering Sen. Jon Nelson said he has been leading the effort to gain minority representation at K-State. He said the Black Student Union had proposed that six Senate positions be opened to minority students, but it has now taken a step backward.

"If we don't get the minority representation we're looking for by next year, we'll push that idea through," Nelson said.

Instead of asking for the allotment of Senate positions, Nelson said he has been working with Student Body President Jason Heinrich to develop another plan. Along with other minority students who have had Senate positions in the past, Nelson said he will visit minority organizations on campus in an effort to acquire potential candidates.

"We have many well-educated minorities that do not know how to get in there," Nelson said. "Minorities usually feel more comfortable working with other minorities."

For minority students who have the desire to run, Nelson said he would like to make sure they have the same chance as other candidates.

"I came in with cold feet last year, but by the luck of the draw, I ended up here," Nelson said.

Nelson said minority senators would not represent their college, but rather all minorities on campus.

"The first and foremost responsibility is the minority population," Nelson said.

Although Senate Chair Jake Worcester said nothing has been presented formally, he said this would be a big change for student government.

"We don't have social representation," Worcester said. "This change would be a break from where we're at right now."

The only concern Worcester said he had is with equal representation of K-State's various colleges. He said the appointment of minorities to Senate could give certain colleges an advantage over others.

Out of 62 student senators, there are only two minorities, Nelson said.

"Current members of SGA and a lot of people on campus probably won't like this idea," Nelson said. "Minority representation is the step we are going to take this year."

Fine Arts Council approves new plan; Senate halts vote

By TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

The Fine Arts Council unanimously voted Thursday to add a student and faculty member, giving the council 19 voting members.

The vote also included restructuring the membership of the council. Under the plan, two students would be elected by the student body, and four students unaffiliated with the Student Governing Association would be appointed by the student body president. Three student senators also would be appointed by the Senate chair.

All students would serve one-year terms, with the exception of two council members elected by the student body.

The new council member also would serve a one-year term and be a member of the student body, to give more representation to students.

"I worry that we would be discriminating against nontraditional students," council member Amy Dix said.

The new faculty member would represent the Ebony Theatre Company.

The vote also included sending unspent money from student groups to the general campus privilege fee reserve account, rather than the council's reserve account. Remaining funds that are 15 percent of the departments' annual allocation also will be placed in the privilege fee reserve account.

Student Senate did not discuss a resolution concerning the council bylaws and funding regulations after authorship was pulled from the resolution.

The amendments will take effect if they receive approved by Senate.

Brownback praises ROTC, veterans while in Wichita

WICHITA — U.S. Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., says the government can and should do more for retired and active veterans.

In a series of appearances Thursday in Wichita, Brownback noted a national tendency to downplay the importance of the military during peacetime. He said that very lack of concern has led to conflicts.

Brownback spoke at a "Salute to America's Veterans," presented by hundreds of Junior ROTC members.

"We should always recognize the tremendous debt we owe our veterans," he said earlier. "The hardships and sacrifices of millions of men and women who have defended our land in war and peace are not forgotten."

Wamego resident to serve 41 years for sexual assault

TOPEKA — A Wamego man was sentenced Wednesday to more than 41 years in prison for two counts of rape and one count of kidnapping.

Larry Wayne Feathers, 44, was sentenced in Shawnee County District Court to concurrent sentences of 41 years and eight months for one of the rapes, 17 years and two months for the second rape and four years and two months for the kidnapping.

Feathers was convicted of the July 1998 kidnapping of an 18-year-old male and two 16-year-old girls while they were running an errand. The three victims testified at a preliminary hearing that Feathers sexually assaulted the two girls and forced them to have sex with the male victim.

The prison sentence will run concurrent a 24-year sentence for an earlier conviction. Feathers was found guilty Jan. 19 in Riley County of aggravated kidnapping, attempted rape and criminal threats for attacking another young couple in July 1998 near the Konza Prairie Scenic Overlook near Manhattan.

Man arrested for permitting fans to enter games for free

LINCOLN, Neb. — A school superintendent from Kansas is accused of taking money to let people into Nebraska home football games.

Roger "Doc" Baskerville, 53, of Washington, Kan., was arrested Saturday on suspicion of theft of services at the Texas A&M game.

University police arrested Baskerville, who takes tickets at the game, after an officer saw another man shake hands with Baskerville and apparently make some kind of exchange, Sgt. Mylo Bushing said.

Police stopped the man, who told them he did not have a ticket and had paid Baskerville $100 to let him and 15 friends into the game, Bushing said.

Virginia man could do time years after being sentenced

PORTSMOUTH, Va. — After Matthew Harley was sentenced to six years in prison for using a gun in a fight, he tried to surrender and begin doing his time. But he was sent home because of a courthouse foul-up.

Because he was not called to serve the sentence, he decided to go on with his life. He took college classes, landed jobs and became a husband and father.

Suddenly, in September, an arrest order arrived — more than four years after Harley was sentenced.

"Judge, somebody messed up. Something fell through the cracks," his attorney, Michael Rosenberg, said during a court hearing Wednesday. "This man's life is now falling through the cracks."

Harley, 27, now is in jail and wants his sentence reduced. Circuit Judge James A. Cales Jr. said his hands were tied because the sentence was the mandatory minimum for Harley's conviction on two counts of using a firearm in a crime.

"Clearly, without pointing fingers at anyone, this was a foul-up somewhere along the way," Cales said. "It reflects poorly on the system, and it should."

Rosenberg said he would ask Gov. Jim Gilmore to intervene.

According to court records, Harley got into a fight outside a convenience store in 1993. One man hit Harley in the face, and Harley fell to the ground. He shot one man in the chest and another man in the shoulder.

A judge rejected Harley's self-defense argument and convicted him on two counts of malicious wounding and two firearm violations. The judge suspended prison time on the malicious wounding counts but sentenced Harley to six years for the firearms violations.

After losing two appeals, Harley went to the courthouse to turn himself in. But there was no paperwork indicating he was to be taken into custody, so he was sent home.

He visited the courthouse at least six times to pay fines in the case and on another occasion was called as a witness in a trial. Nobody ever contacted him about his sentence, he said.

During Wednesday's hearing, the judge heard testimony from Harley's mother, wife and pastor. Harley also took the stand to describe his life in recent years.

"Basically," he said, "I just tried to take care of my family, reach my goal of owning a house and taking care of my children."

EU attacks wall separating Gypsies from other Czechs

PRAGUE, Czech Republic — A wall built by city officials to separate Gypsies from other residents is unacceptable, a European Union official said Thursday.
